Drinking increases among women

There has been a "significant increase" in problem drinking among American women in the last five years, the Association of Junior Leagues Woman to Woman alcohol advisory board reported.

The report, which was not meant to be a scientific survey, was designed rather to give an informal measure of services to female alcoholics, to determine the size of the problem and identify gaps in assistance.

The report gave no statistical support for its findings.

"A significant increase in the number of women with drinking problems, compared to the number five years ago, was noted by 56 percent of treatment centers and 41 percent of gatekeepers interviewed (in 24 cities)," the group said.

Gatekeepers were described as doctors, clergy, social service personnel and law-enforcement officials who come in contact with many female drinkers.

"Because of the significant male bias in the study of alcohol effects and alcoholism, treatment modes have been designed without necessary information about needed programs specifically for women," the association noted.

Former first lady Betty Ford, a reformed alcoholic, is a member of the advisory board.

The report gave no figures on the size of the increase among female problem drinkers and none was expected.

Other highlights of the report:

— The population of alcohol-treatment centers surveyed in the 24 cities is 28 percent female, up 8 percent from a 1980 study by federal authorities.

— About half of the 162 treatment centers surveyed reported they had at least patterned some of their treatment toward women, including female staff and counselors, single-sex group therapy, counseling for sexual disfunction and abuse, and drug counseling.

— Only two of 162 treatment centers provide child-care services to women in treatment, even though a lack of child care is often recognized as a serious barrier preventing women from seeking alcohol rehabilitation.
