Schaefer's school bill killed

Two Senate committees, voting Wednesday in swift succession, killed a Schaefer administration bill that would establish a math-science school for Maryland's brightest students.

The Senate Economic and Environmental Affairs Committee voted 10-1 against the legislation to create a residential high school that would train 600 students each year. Sen. John Bambacus, R-Allegheny, cast the sole vote in favor of the bill.

The Senate Budget and Taxation Committee voted unanimously Wednesday night to kill the initiative, in what legislators said sent a "strong message" to the House of the Delegates where the bill still is pending.

Gov. William Donald Schaefer, who touted the plan as a crucial economic development tool, has found little support in the Legislature for the high school. Opponents said money for the school — Schaefer wanted $13.5 million next year — would be better spent on local programs for gifted students.

Schaefer spokesman Bob Douglas said the governor "thinks it's sad when form conquers content," suggesting the bill fell prey to legislators "more interested in the administration following proper procedure than in helping Marylanders."

Schaefer, who shunned reporters' questions Wednesday before the first committee vote, had predicted Tuesday the initiative would be killed. He said lawmakers would reject the math-science school to prove they would not "rubber-stamp" all of his initiatives this year.

"The theory is that if he gets everything, that's wrong," Schaefer said Tuesday.

The votes, two days before the midway point of the General Assembly session, were a blow to Schaefer's legislative agenda. Legislators suggest several of the governor's other initiatives, including a proposed $20 million fund for economic development, face serious trouble.

"I have never seen so much opposition from every corner," said Sen. Fred Malkus, D-Dorchester, a member of the Economic and Environmental Affairs Committee. He said he voted against the bill believing more students would be helped if the state worked to attract better teachers across Maryland.

"I don't see any real support for it," said Sen. Bernard Fowler D-Calvert, a Budget and Taxation Committee member. "Some think it's not appropos for Maryland at this time."

Bambacus, a Frostburg State professor, termed his single vote in favor of the legislation "a tough call" — one that would not win him any votes at home because rural areas likely areas likely would send few students to a math-science high school.

But he said Maryland needs such a program to help economic development efforts, and to better train students "for the global market." He favored the legislation for one of its overlooked measures — creation of a math-science training center.

Administration officials said the center might be shifted around the state, and would help spark teachers' interest in math and science instruction.

Bambacus said he regretted "there was no full discussion" of the bill but that he suspected "another agenda at work."

Del. Davis, community fight Hopkins waste policy

By Alicia Benjamin
AFRO Staff Writer

Del. Clarence Davis D-45 and some East Baltimore residents are leery of Johns Hopkins officials who say their newly built infectious waste incinerator will not adversely affect neighbors health.

Citizens expressed their concern over the affects of the smoke produced by the incinerator at a January 20 public hearing with state Department of Environment officials.

The department spent one month evaluating citizen concerns and the Johns Hopkins proposal for the incinerator.

"We don't think people will adversely be affected," said Ray Feldmann, spokesman for the state DOE.

East Baltimore residents do not want the incinerator in their area but that is not a reason to deny the proposal. Feldman said.

"There's more of a public perception of a problem than any real problem," he asserted.

The Hopkins incinerator will burn infectious waste including blood and needles at extremely high temperatures.

Davis and his aide Joseph P. Kendall, are concerned that the incinerators' exiting fluent will harm residents in the area of the hospital.

The state DOE will take samples of the fluent and monitor the incinerator but Kendall said that will not be enough.

DOE will only measure individual components but will not measure what affects mixtures will have and the level of pollutants in the air caused by the waste burning.

Kendall was also concerned about the fluent from Hopkins coming into contact with waste from area incinerators such as the Mercy Hospital and Church Homes Hospital incinerators.

Kendall said there is a lack of data and studies showing the affects infectious waste incinerators have on their surrounding populations.

The Federal Environmental Protection Agency has done very minimal studies and none are current, he said.

"There are no adverse health affects we've been able to see with this operation," said Feldmann.

The high burning temperatures, which range from 1500 to 1600 degrees Far. destroys anything put into the incinerator, Feldmann said. The only time when there might be a problem is the period it takes to reach the final burning temperature from the start up of the incinerator.

"We look at different compounds that come out of the smoke stack, evaluate each and run different tests to make sure they wouldn't present adverse health affects to the community," said Feldmann.

"We will have unannounced inspections and make sure no visible substance is coming out because that would mean there's a problem," he explained.

The state has also established guidelines the hospital must follow to continue to operate, which include burning the waste at a specific temperature and not putting more than 1,000 pounds per hour in the' incinerator.

Davis is also upset the hospital had nearly completed construction of the burner before they requested the proper permit from DOE allowing them to begin building.

"We have a concern over how Johns Hopkins can do what they want," the delegate commented.

The state issued a cease and desist order about three weeks ago saying Johns Hopkins could not continue construction of the incinerator until DOE gave them a permit.

The hospital did have a building permit from the city and they erroneously thought that permit was adequate, said Robert Neall, Vice President for Development and External Affairs for the Johns Hopkins Health System.

Hopkins was fined $2,000 for their mistake and must participate in testing of the discharge from the burner to determine what is discharged.

There are 88 infectious waste incinerators in operation in Maryland and 36 of them are in the Baltimore Metropolitan area. Kendall said 22 of those 36 are within the Baltimore City limits.

"We are being affected by those 36 incinerators," he asserted.

Additional students and data need to be compiled which show the affects the incinerator will have on the area, Kendall said.

Each time they construct a new downtown building in Baltimore all the data they have becomes obsolete because the buildings change the pattern of the air.'

"We suggest a state commission be formed to look at infectious waste problems," he continued.

Davis is now working on a bill which would call for the formation of the commission.

"The solution in mind is to put regional incinerators away from highly populated areas," Kendall said. "If Hopkins were the only one it wouldn't be a problem but when we have others in the area it becomes a problem."

When asked if Hopkins officials had met with concerned citizens, Neall said he would be glad to meet with residents to explain the conditions of their permit.

Davis said he feels the hospital system has been callous in its approach to the health risks of its neighbors and that the permit request appeared to be an after-the-fact motion.
