Editor's Message

It's time to take the pulse of Black America

Every 12 months Americans of African-American ancestry pause to tally their gains and to count their losses. We call it "Black History Month." During the 29 or so days of February, we take the long view on the continuing struggle to form a more perfect union between the who that we are and the who our ancestors gave their lives for us to become. For 29 or so days, Black History becomes American history, as the entire nation learns a little and we hopefully learn a lot more about us. Hopefully we seize the time to bolster our self-esteem and expand our body of self-knowledge to include our accomplishments dating from before the Mayflower to after the Reagan years, and all of our singular and collective achievements in between. It is a body of knowledge which will never go dry from a supply which can never be exhausted.

Join us as we peer backward in our forward striving.

With admiration,
Charles H. Brown
