Poetical.

The Great Hereafter.

'Tis sweet to think, when struggling
The goal of life to win,
That just beyond the shores of time
The better years begin.

When through the nameless ages
I cast my longing eyes,
Before me, like a boundless sea,
The great hereafter lies.

Along its brimming bosom,
Perpetual summer smiles,
And gathers, like a golden robe,
Around the emerald isles.

There, in the blushing distance,
Its balmy breezes found,
I seem to see the flowering groves,
Of fairest Eden's land.

And far beyond the islands,
That gem the waves serene,
The image of the cloudless shore
Of holy Heaven is seen.

Onto the great hereafter—
At first me lies and dark—
I freely now and gladly give
Of life the vanishing bark.

And in the fair of haven,
When shadowy sails are passed,
By angel hands its quivering sails
Shall be furled at last.

Selected Miscellany.

Way They Never Married.

"Oh, Clara, I wonder who that handsome young man is leaning against the post over there. Why, did you ever see such an expressive mouth, such piercing eyes, such a commanding forehead? I tell you what, I would become acquainted with this Adonis and exert all my most bewitching charms to win him."

"I wouldn't mind knowing him myself," said Clara.

Yes Harry Livingston was handsome. He had just arrived at a watering-place hotel, and was receiving considerably against one of the pretty girls. He was a great one to travel, and having the means and leisure for, being in receipt of a restless disposition, he could not content himself long in one place. He was quiet and reticent in his manners, and had refined in his feelings and tastes. Proud and distant to strangers.

Now was the man who separated himself from the crowd to a determined science, and repulsed the advances of fair women by a chilling reserve, that Nanet Warren had resolved to conquer. Nanet Warren was a beautiful girl, with all the graces of fascination which woman's heart so often sought, but never if they well knew, to win. She was capable of loving, in a simple and unsophisticated fashion, the man who could be forbidding to others, who never was forbidding to her.

Livingston was a man who didn't problem—an enigma, a strange one, he was hard to add to the list of conquests. However, in the course of a few days he succeeded in obtaining an introduction to one of those attractive young ladies, who, from him nothing attractive, who, who was the pretty girl at the party, failed to make a single conquest, not that there were none to win, we will have occasion to refer to her society, but that she was to be the last one, and that he was to be the last to succumb. She could not comprehend it. Was he engaged? Was he married? Had he been jilted? Was he a bachelor? These questions suggested themselves to her, but left unanswered, made Nanet feel restless, as she thought of him there where she was not. He next evening Livingston was standing in his accustomed place, the same young man was with at the smooth flowed waters of the lake, in which the moonbeams danced with the light of the gaslight in the hotel, which he was soon to be invited by Nanet.

"Well, Clara, what do you think of him?"

"Why, he must be in love, ain't you?"

"Nonsense!"

"Well, what of your wife?"

"Silly!"

"Who, then, are you thinking of?"

"Nothing!"

"Give me a five minutes' chat of yours, its capacity must be wonderful to hold such a lot of nothing, ha! ha! ha!"

"Do come to the point, Clara."

"Well, you know Nanet Warren, and you know that Nanet Warren had resolved to conquer this Livingston, and that Nanet Warren is a beautiful girl, and that Nanet Warren had never met her equal, and that Nanet Warren was so often sought, that Nanet Warren was sought, that Nanet Warren was sought, that Nanet Warren was
