Where is that father, whom no more

Those youthful children meet,

As when returning from his toil

They met him with a smile,

And by their smiles made him forget

His cares and weariness,

While each did vie with each to give

The sweetest fond caress?

Where is that mother, on whose care

Those loving ones relied?

How they will miss a mother's love

When earthly ills befall;

She, too, has gone—oh God protect

And shield them now from harm,

And throw around that youthful throng

Thine all supporting arm.

They have gone home, gone home to dwell

In mansions bright and fair,

Where never come the storms of time,

The clouds of grief and care,

This life is but a pilgrimage,

A journey to the tomb,

Through which we all must pass, and rise

Immortal from its gloom. *
