John Marshall's Eloquence

Chief Justice John Marshall was not an orator of the spellbinder type, but after he began practice at the Richmond Va. bar he soon rose to a commanding position. William Wirt, one of the ablest lawyers of his day, though several years his junior, said of him: "This extraordinary man, without the aid of fancy, without the advantage of person, voice, attitude, gesture, or any other ornaments of an orator, deserves to be considered as one of the most eloquent men in the world. If eloquence be, as it is said to consist in the power of seizing the attention, with the force and rapidity of a battering ram, and of overpowering the judgment and the imagination of the hearer, and of leading them whither he pleases, this man is eloquent. Whether he reasons, or relates, or describes, he is equally eloquent. Marshall may have had his rivals, but I have never heard of them. Washington offered him a great law office, which he declined. He was also offered the attorney generalship, which he declined and Jefferson offered him the position of secretary of state, which he also declined. He was also offered the chief justiceship before he was finally in 1801 appointed chief justice."—Philadelphia Press.

Not Without Honor

William Phelps, president of the university of Yale, was recently entertained by New Haven people at a dinner at which he was called upon for a few words. He said in part: "I am reminded of the story of the Irishman who was being pursued by a mob with intent to lynch him. He ran into a church and was pursued down the aisle by the mob with a rope. He ran into the vestry and was pursued by the mob with a rope. He ran into the pulpit and was pursued by the mob with a rope. He ran into the pulpit and was pursued by the mob with a rope.
