HOW THEY REASON ABOUT THE NEGRO EXODUS AT THE WEST.

In Ohio, the farming population is as excited as Governor Harris has been reported to be in Memphis! Two thousand a day are sending petitions to the Legislature to prevent their ingress into the State. And an Ohio farmer, in plain but solid style, thus writes to the Crisis, why farmers object to negro immigration:

I thought while writing to you on other business, I would tell you some of the reasons why we think the negro should be prohibited from settling in Ohio. And first we believe it is a duty we owe to the white men who are now in the ranks of the army, fighting to maintain the Constitution and Laws, to keep their places for them until they return, and not permit their places to be filled by niggers while they are fighting our battles.

Let me illustrate: Jim Reynolds, his wife and four children, were living in a house which he rented of Mr. John Eaton, when the war broke out. The President called soldiers—Mr. Eaton is a Union man and has a large farm and much property to see to, and cannot enlist. Jim is full of patriotism, and relying on Mr. Eaton that his family shall be taken care of, rushes into the ranks of the army, for what? To save the Government and the property of Mr. Eaton—Jim has none to save. But after Jim is gone, his wife cannot procure wood, clothing, or provisions; she has to leave Mr. Eaton's house and move home to her poor old parents, where, by constant labor and anxiety, her health fails her—children become ragged and destitute. The war goes on—in the vicinity of the two contending armies society becomes disorganized—the slave runs away from his master, and having been made to believe that Ohio is a paradise for a nigger, of course they come here. Yes, old black Tom takes the advantage of the presence of the army in which Jim Reynolds is fighting, and runs away from his master in Kentucky and comes to Mr. John Eaton and others, as Jim used to do.

The war finally closes and Jim receives an honorable discharge and returns to his native place. He finds his wife emaciated and her constitution broken—his children ragged and beggars. He thinks, to better their condition, he will go to Mr. Eaton, and rent the house he left. Mr. Eaton tells him that he has rented the house to black Tom, who got his liberty when he (Jim) was in the army in Kentucky. This is a hard stroke on Jim; still he hopes, and asks Mr. Eaton if those rails are made yet that they talked about before he went to the war; Jim says he has nothing to do, and would like to make them and take some flour for his family. Mr. Eaton tells him that Tom has offered to make them cheaper than the usual price and take corn, and he let him have the job. Jim asks if he has no corn to husk, wood to chop, or something of the kind for him to do; but Mr. Eaton tells him that the times are hard, and himself and Tom will have to do all his work. Jim returns tired and hungry to his family; the sight of his hungry children starts him out to make an effort for work; the neighbors all tell him the same story—times are hard—they had to hire niggers because the nigger would do more work for the same money than the white man could. Jim tells them that this is the reason that slaveholders have niggers in the South, because they think it is cheaper than white labor. Jim starts to see the overseer of the poor without any very exalted admiration of the results of the war, so far as it has affected free white labor in Ohio. The case here delineated will be the case of thousands in Ohio if the prohibition of niggers is not attended to.

The rich man will become more wealthy by hiring a cheap class of labor, the laboring white man will become poorer because the number of laborers is increased, and of a cheaper kind—Classes will be formed in Ohio; the rich will form one class, and the poor white man who has to work out with the nigger will have to associate with him, and will form the other class of plain people. But the hypocritical philanthropist will say, to prevent a poor negro from settling in Ohio would be inhuman and unchristian. We deny the declaration, and claim that it is good religion; it is doing by our poor white neighbors as we would that they should do unto us. Let the white man live regardless of niggers, who we are no more bound to provide for than we are for the inhabitants of the Fegee Islands. This is the principle carried out by all the tender-footed philanthropists in the land. I care not what church or party he belongs to, or what doctrine he may preach. Now for the proof—here is Mr. Jenkins, occupies 114 acres of land, and is rich, enjoys all the comforts of life, his family indulge in many luxuries. His neighbor, Mr. Nash, has a large respectable family; they are very poor; Mr. Nash served through the war for the Union, and now has no place to live and no land to farm, but Mr. Jenkins will not let him come on the land he owns and build a house to shelter his family, nor work his land to procure the necessaries of life for his children. And why? Because Mr. Jenkins said the land is his; he bought it, and it is his legal right to say who may come on to it or occupy it. This is right. If it is right for Mr. Jenkins to say who may settle on 114 acres of the surface of Ohio because he bought it—may not the white inhabitants of Ohio, who have bought the whole of her surface, decide as to whether niggers or monkeys may occupy it? But some claim that a Legislature has no right to prevent a white man from disposing of his property as it seems to him best, and that he may use it as he may please—let a nigger live on it or not, as may seem best to him. Now we deny this: we concede the right to our neighbor to use his property as he may please, provided by so doing he does not interfere with the rights of others.

From the Washington Republican.

THE ENEMY'S SICK AND HIS SUPPLIES.

A late Kentucky letter to the New York Times gives the following account of the enemy's abandoned hospital at Bowling Green:

"Dr. Phillips, an assistant, showed to us the hospital stores found in the house which the Confederate army had left in their flight. In an old safe were two hundred bottles of sulphate quinine and a large box of patent lint, bearing on its rolls unmistakeable evidence of English manufacture. Several cases of elegant surgical instruments were also found. The sheets and pillow-cases left for the sick were of the purest and finest linen, each one marked. A large number of these were presents from ladies: On the bed in which your correspondent slept was a linen sheet, bearing on its corner the following inscription: 'To Captain Semmes, of the Jackson Guards, from the ladies of Columbia, Tennessee,' and a large number of pillow-cases bore the names of a committee of ladies from Murfreesboro', Tennessee. With these hospital stores were found delicacies of all kinds, such as jellies, wines, farina, &c., besides a large chest of medicines of various kinds, neatly put up and marked."

It takes more than one swallow to make a summer, and it does not follow that the Confederate hospitals have been everywhere well provided, because this one at Bowling Green abounded with jellies, wines and the finest linen. But we may be assured that nineteen-twentieths of the stories of the destitution of the enemy, to which a certain class of newspapers have given such a persistent circulation, are the merest fabrications. Wherever we get at their camps we find evidence of an abundance of food, clothing, ammunition, and munitions of war of every description. No matter how many cannon we capture, he has always a few more left of "the same sort;" and as to food, his resources are absolutely inexhaustible.

"Corn without end," is the report from the march of General Curtis' column, in the extreme West; and here at the East in Virginia, wherever we penetrate we find unthreshed stacks of wheat on every hand. The South is full of supplies for man and beast, and so far as capacity to produce them is concerned, can maintain war indefinitely. The idea of putting down this rebellion by "starvation," or "pressure," or "blockade," with which the country was amused so long, is exploded and abandoned, and public opinion is everywhere up to the platform of advancing and fighting, laid down in the President's order of January 27th.

A serious mutiny occurred in the Wisconsin 17th regiment, at Madison, a few days ago. There was some delay in paying them, and nearly three hundred refused to obey the order to embark in the cars for St. Louis. They were all placed under arrest.
