The Proposed New Railroad Connection between Washington and Baltimore--A Mysterious Scheme.

To the Editors of the Maryland News Sheet:

GENTLEMEN:—The following very extraordinary passage in the Report of the Secretary of War, which accompanied the Annual Message of the President to Congress, has recently come under my notice. It does not appear to have attracted the attention of the public, which it eminently deserves, and especially when taken in connection with subsequent and yet unfinished proceedings of the House of Representatives, and also with the discreet letter which Mr. Garrett addressed to the Secretary of War. The extract alluded to is as follows.

"Should the navigation of the Potomac river be interrupted by blockade or the severities of winter, it would become absolutely necessary, for the proper supply of the troops in the District of Columbia and vicinity, and of the inhabitants of this city, to provide additional railroad connection between Washington and Baltimore. A responsible company, with a charter from the State of Maryland, have proposed to do this upon condition that the Government will endorse their bonds; they binding themselves to set aside annually a sufficient sum for their redemption at maturity, and thus eventually release the Government from any liability whatever, and to charge for transportation, rates in no case to exceed four cents a ton per mile for freight and three cents per mile for passengers. During the continuance of the war, however, their charge for passengers is not to exceed two cents per mile."

This is an astounding revelation. It is not contained in an anonymous pamphlet, but in a document of the gravest and most formal character, ushered into public notice under the solemn responsibility of the Secretary of War. The assertion is that a responsible company, with a charter from the State of Maryland, have proposed to build a new railroad between here and Washington, working at low rates, and thus superseding entirely the existing Washington Branch. Was the Secretary deceived or not? Is there any latent charter in our Code which could be suddenly sprung into a forced existence, or if not, who gave the Secretary this erroneous information? Who are the responsible company? The plan bears the appearance of having been well digested. The issue of United States bonds to make the road, the setting apart of a portion of the revenue as a sinking fund to pay them when due, the stipulation as to reduced tolls, are all indications of a thoroughly prepared scheme. Somebody has been at work to concoct the most stupendous piece of chicanery, and build up gigantic fortunes upon the ruin of the community. Who is it? Is there no mode of finding out? Nor is it yet given up. On the contrary, as the case now stand, the House of Representatives have the subject still before them, under a call upon the Secretary of War for further information.

The State of Maryland, the city of Baltimore and the people thereof, have invested millions upon millions in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company; and here are a set of unscrupulous speculators who are plotting to sweep it all away into their own pockets. Perhaps they are in the midst of us, and, perhaps strangers from abroad. Again I ask, is there no mode of finding out upon what authority Mr. Cameron made the startling statement which is found in the beginning of this communication?

BALTIMORE.

The Censorship of the Press.

To the Editors of the News Sheet:

DEAR SIRS:—In these days of a "Censorship of the Press" it may not be uninteresting to your numerous readers to peruse a leaf of English History, with the opinions of the late lamented Macaulay. The Licensing Act, to which reference is made, was passed soon after the Restoration; it expired in 1695; but the judges decided that this liberty of a free Press did not extend to Gazettes, and that by the Common Law of England, no man, not authorized by the Crown, had a right to publish political news. We quote from Macaulay:

"On the history of the Licensing Act, no preceding writer has thought it worth while to expend any care or labor. Yet surely, the events which led to the establishment of the liberty of the press in England, and in all countries peopled by the English race, may be thought to have as much interest for the present generation as any of battles and sieges. During the first three years of William's reign, scarcely a voice seems to have been raised against the restrictions which the law imposed upon literature. While the Licensing Act was in force, there was no newspaper in England except the London Gazette, which was [illegible] the Secretary of State wished the nation to know. * * The Gazette was so partial and so meagre a chronicle of events, that, though it had no competitor, it had but a small circulation. In truth, a person who had studied the history of his own times only in the Gazette, would have been ignorant of many important events.

"On the third of May, 1695, the law which had subjected the press to a censorship expired. In a short time a large number of newspapers were issued; at first they were small and mean looking, printed on scraps of dirty paper, which would not now be thought good enough for street ballads. What is now called a leading article [illegible] peared, except when intelligence was [illegible] markable fact that the infamy [illegible] side of the [illegible] circumstance that the editors were, at first, upon their good behavior. It was by no means clear that their trade was not in itself illegal. The Government connived at the publication of the newspapers, and the conductors carefully abstained from publishing any thing that could provoke or alarm the Government. It is true that in one of the earliest numbers of one of the new journals, a paragraph appeared which seemed intended to convey an insinuation that the Princess Anne did not sincerely rejoice at the fall of Namur. But the printer made haste to atone for his fault by the most submissive apologies. It seems certain that the Government of William gained not a little by the substitution of these printed newspapers, compared under constant dread of the Attorney-General, for the old news letters, which were written with unbounded license.

"The pamphleteers were under less restraint than the journalists, yet no person who had studied with attention the political controversies of that time can have failed to perceive that the libels on William's person and Government were decidedly less coarse and rancorous during the latter half of his reign than during the earlier half. And the reason evidently is that the press, which had been fettered during the earlier half, was free during the latter half. The emancipation of the press produced a great and salutary change. The best and wisest men in the ranks of the opposition now assumed an office which had hitherto been abandoned to the unprincipled or the hot-headed. Tracts against the Government were written in a style not misbecoming statesmen and gentlemen; and even the composition of the lower and fiercer class of malcontents became somewhat less brutal and less ribald than in the days of the licensers."

Thus Macaulay wrote of the "Censorship of the Press," and the resultant effect after its abolishment, in the seventeenth century. "History repeats itself." It remains for some future historian to record "The Censorship of the Press," and its effect, in one of those "countries peopled by the English race," in the nineteenth century.

ARTHUR.

DEATH OF THE "BEARDED WOMAN."—Julia Pastrana, the "Bearded Woman," who was exhibited for some time at Barnum's Museum, and subsequently in various parts of this country and Europe, died in Moscow in 1860. A London paper gives the following strange particulars of her posthumous careers:

"On the following day she was embalmed by her medical advisers at the request of her husband, on the understanding that she should be his property, he paying the expense of the process of embalming. A dispute arose subsequently as to his right to the body, which rendered it necessary for him to produce the marriage certificate, to fetch which he went to America, and having transmitted the necessary document to his agent, he died in New York. The body of the nondescript thus fell into the hands of his agent, and after being shut up for two years, it is now exhibiting at the Burlington Gallery, Piccadilly. The figure is dressed in the ordinary exhibition costume, worked by her and used during her life, and her bust, face, and arms present pretty much the appearance of a well-stuffed animal. The embalming is effected by injecting a fluid at an opening in the chest. The limbs are plump and round as in life, with the exception of the fingers, which are somewhat shrivelled, and (as a specimen of the art of preserving a human body) Julia Pastrana is as great a curiosity now as she was when alive. Her child, which lived thirty-six hours, is also exhibited; its flat nose and thick hair on the head give it an appearance which is most unpleasant to contemplate."

A BAD SPECULATION.—Freight was engaged today for three hundred and sixty cases of muskets to go from this port direct by ship to London. The cases hold thirty or thirty-two muskets each, so that nearly twelve thousand stand of arms will thus be forwarded to our Anglo-Saxon neighbors by a single vessel. These arms, we believe, are a lot kindly sent over by an enterprising speculator to supply our supposed need; but they are either a surplus stock, or not exactly suited to our wants.—Journal of Commerce.
