SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1862.

THE CONFEDERATE GUNBOATS.—It cannot be denied that a great deal of anxiety is felt respecting the rumors continually coming up from Memphis and New Orleans, to the effect that the Confederates have from eight to twelve iron-clad gunboats ready for service. If they possess boats of this kind at all, it is quite probable that they are of a heavier and more impenetrable character than that of Foote's flotilla in the Western rivers. The tenacity with which they cling to Island Ten may be accounted for on the supposition that they are expecting soon to be reinforced by their new gunboats. They brag of this, and their bragging is the suspicious part of the story. They have so continually boasted of what they were going to do, that a shade of doubt is thrown over the statement as to the existence of iron gunboats in the Confederate ports. Meantime, our Congress appears to act entirely upon the doubt. It goes on quietly, without passing the Naval Appropriation bill, and without giving the subject a moment's consideration. The appropriation for iron-clad vessels passed the Senate and came to the House several days ago; but the Naval Committee does not attempt to report it to the House; and, we suppose, for the reason that the Ways and Means Committee will not consent to waive the Tax bill. All other legislation is blocked in that branch of Congress for the present. Were it not for the fact that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are taking the responsibility of providing for the contingencies of the future, anticipating somewhat the action of Congress, it might turn out that this negligence would be ruinous to the Government and country. That the Confederates have several iron-clad boats nearly ready is pretty certain, and it only remains to be seen how soon they will use them as they did the Merrimac. Mr. Stanton, we are glad to hear, is not asleep over the threatened danger, but is doing all that he can to prepare for the event.

LOSS OF THE BRITISH BARK LADY FLORA HASTINGS.—Capt. Winchell, of the ship Samuel Russell, arrived at New York on Thursday morning from Foo Chow, reports:

Jan. 23, in lat. 19° 20' south, long. 72° 40' east, at 7 P. M. (sea time), saw a vessel bearing south, 10 miles distant, with a signal of distress flying, and immediately hauled up for her; at 3.30 boarded her, and by papers found on board she proved to be the British bark Lady Flora Hastings, owned by J. Wilson of Liverpool, commanded by Captain Thomas Germane, from Maulmain with timber; could not ascertain where bound. The main and mizzen masts were broken off two feet above the deck, and the fore topmast even with the eyes of the rigging, and flying jib boom gone, the jib slatting and dragging in the water; the fore topsail set double reefed and yard on the cap; the foresail blown to rags and not much but the bolt-rope left; bulwarks all gone on both sides; the main rail broken off abreast the mainmast, probably by the falling of the mainmast; the vessel waterlogged; hatches all washed away, and the sea making a clean breach across the deck.

On the hurricane house aft were two small canvas houses, and the foretop was all housed around and over with canvas, where no doubt the unfortunate crew had lived after the deck was under water; also in the foretop were found pots, kettles, pans, &c., and a few small stores. We took from the wreck one boat-load, and among the things was the captain's writing-desk, with all of his letters and papers, which were carefully put away, and can be had by applying to Messrs. A. A. Low & Brothers, No. 31 Burling slip, New York City.—To all appearance, the crew had been taken off by some passing vessel, and in great haste, for the captain's writing-desk had been packed, ready to put into a boat. From the appearance of things lying around, he could not think the vessel had been abandoned more than two or three days at most.
