THE INCUBATION OF THE PYTHON.—All hopes of the hatching are now at an end; the eggs were removed on Friday morning. There is no doubt that the frequent removals of the blanket in uncovering the eggs, and the occasional partial uncoilings of the snake, caused too numerous sudden changes of temperature for the proper development of the young, which originally we know, from Mr. Bartlett's direction, were in them. The effects of these disturbances attained a climax in the lengthened period of the snake's absence in shedding her skin, during which the eggs became completely cold. The necessity for their removal was not only apparent from the bad state they were in, but the impoverished condition of the python, diminished in bulk by probably at least one-third of her former dimensions, and her long absence from food, now thirty-two weeks, naturally led to anxiety as to her ultimate safety if she were allowed to hopelessly continue her sitting. The snake behaved spitefully during the operation. We cannot but express the hope that Dr. Sclater will soon have another opportunity of satisfying the interest which this incubation has excited, when the like deference to the natural inquisitiveness of the public could be, with propriety, forbidden by the Council of the Society, without any ground for offence against them.—London Review.

SCENE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—A singular scene took place in the House on the evening of the 8th. There had evidently been an intention not to make a House, and on the Speaker taking his seat at the table there were only about thirty members present. Slowly and gradually, however, they dropped in, and seeing the danger of the number being complete, one Hon. gentleman attempted to slip out, but he was stopped by the Sergeant-at-Arms. At that time the members present were heard saying, "there's no bill of fare," &c. At last the Speaker began to count, when there were just thirty-nine members present, the Speaker making the fortieth, but some mistake appeared to exist among the members, for one of them throwing open the door wide, cried at the top of his voice—"Who goes home?" amidst roars of laughter, an ordinary salutation when the House is "up," and at the same time a relic of old customs, when the Speaker used to be escorted through the dangerous streets to his own house by a body of the members.

IRON TOWERS.—In the autumn of last year the Federal Government sent an order to this country for the construction of four iron towers similar to that now on board the Monitor. The commission was accepted, and would have been faithfully executed if the Trent affair had not occurred, and so prevented the shipment of all warlike stores, and among them these particular castles. The contractor is now saddled with the product of his labor, as, in the meantime, the Americans supplied themselves on the spot, and he now contemplates offering them to the Emperor of the French, as on this side of the water we are provided with Coles' cupolas, which weigh only 72 tons to Ericson's 200 tons. No little difference of weight for a ship to carry!—Army and Navy Gazette.

The Paris Droit relates the discovery of a dead body in the Seine under the following singular circumstances: Two boatmen, who happened to be on the small island in the middle of the Seine, close to the bridge of Asnieres, were struck with amazement on seeing a man at the bottom of the river standing erect, with a stick in his hand, as if walking. There was not a breath of air stirring, and the water was so limpid that they could distinguish the man's features and dress. Though both of them had often drawn dead bodies from the river, they were so astonished at this strange appearance that they hesitated to approach it. On entering the water, however, and getting nearer, they found that the erect position of the body was an optical illusion, for the man really lay quite flat on the bottom. The unfortunate deceased was apparently an Auvergnat, but nothing being found to prove his identity, his body was removed to the Morgue.

EXTRAORDINARY SENTENCE.—The Journal de Genève states that a man named Girard was tried a few days ago on a charge of having stolen a cat, which he killed and ate. Being found guilty, he was condemned—1, to pay the cost of his imprisonment before trial; 2, to two days' imprisonment on bread and water; 3, to receive thirty blows with a stick; 4, to remain four years within his own parish; 5, to be inscribed on the black list; 6, to be placed under the strict surveillance of the municipal police; 7, to the expense of conveying him home, and 8, to all other expenses, and to repair the damage done.

The Paradise birds, the expected arrival of which we announced in our last impression, arrived in safety at the Zoological Society's Gardens, Regent's Park, on the afternoon of Tuesday last.—They are two young male birds, just coming into full plumage, and appear to be lively and in good health. The lateral tufts, which form such a conspicuous ornament in the adult male of this species (Paradisea papuana) are just beginning to be developed. A large vacant room, formerly the upper portion of the old museum building, has been fitted up with a cage 20 feet by 11 for these birds, and will give them ample space to display their plumes in full beauty.—Literary Gazette.

Mr. Preece, the engineer to the Electric and International Telegraph Company, stated in a lecture delivered by him last week that in 1845 there were only 500 miles of telegraph in the United Kingdom. In 1850 there were 1,800 miles, in 1855 there were 3,400 miles, and at the present time there are 60,000 miles. In America there are 40,000 miles. On the European continent there are 30,000 miles. In India, Canada and Australia there are 15,000 miles. The length of telegraph in Great Britain and her dependencies is greater than that of America and Europe together.

The convent of the Sisters of Mercy, Belfast, was last week seized by bailiffs for a dept of £200.

FOREIGN LITERARY ITEMS.

The Publishers' Circular, in announcing Thackeray's retirement from the editorship of the Cornhill, makes some absurd misstatements. Mr. Thackeray "has not quarrelled with the Cornhill publishers or Cornhill readers;" but he is unhappy in his mind, because he never enters a room full of company without meeting a lot of rejected contributors. We can say, on the best authority, that this is a mistake. There is no doubt that the foolish modern plan of publishing an editor's name sometimes causes unpleasantness, but this minor annoyance is not the explanation of Mr. Thackeray's retirement. Months ago, a friend of the great humorist casually asked him why he had not allowed Messrs. Smith and Elder to call their new miscellany Thackeray's Magazine. "It is not Thackeray's Magazine," was his answer, "but perhaps there may be a Thackeray's Magazine some day." And he proceeded to explain that he was editor only in name; that the publishers overruled his decisions as to acceptance and rejection. "In fact," he said, indignantly, "Mr. Smith edits the Corn hill."

The notion is rather amusing. One of the best writers and most accurate critics of the day is retained as nominal editor, and the real editorship is done in a lady's boudoir. This accounts for "Stranger than Fiction" and other feminine follies. Probably, the publishers will not regret the separation, as, if rumor may be relied on, only the most fabulous success would make it possible to continue the prodigal sum paid for the use of Mr. Thackeray's name.—Saunders' Literary Budget.

When the erection of the new library and reading-room at the British Museum was suggested, it was stated that that library would hold 800,000 volumes, and thus provide for the annual increase for 40 years, at 20,000. But the annual increase is now at the rate of about 35,000 volumes; and although the new building will contain more than it was originally estimated to hold, it will at this rate be full in about 25 years. In the event of the removal of the natural history collections to Kensington, it is proposed to appropriate further space for books, so as to provide for about 200,000 more; but the larger portion of the room that is gained is required for the department of antiquities.

"The London Morning Chronicle," says the Illustrated News, "is, we believe, not entirely defunct. It is published 'occasionally' on half a sheet of note paper, just to keep the name alive—thus securing the copyright, and preventing eager speculators from starting a new Morning Chronicle."

Mr. Carlyle, who has found that it will require five volumes to contain his history of Frederick the Great, has resolved to publish the third volume, which has been printed off some time, by itself. The fourth volume, which is well advanced in type, will likely be kept back until the completion of the fifth.—London Critic.

Victor Hugo's long-promised novel, "Les Miserables," has at length appeared.

The "Chronicles of Carlingford," which have appeared in Blackwood, are attributed to George Eliot.

DIFFUSING LIGHT ON INTRIGUES.—The Tribune, in a long and labored assault upon the Hon. Mr. Diven, of this State, who though a Republican is not Fremont's Republican, thus throws some light upon the intrigues against Gen. McClellan:

"When, after delays which, however justifiable, were utterly at variance with the popular expectations which their authors had seen fit to excite, the Grand Army of the Republic was at length put in motion for the campaign of 1862, a very large proportion of those who had most closely and carefully studied the past management of that army agreed in the conviction that a change in its command was desirable. Among those who shared this conviction the Secretary of War, and nearly or quite every member of the Congressional Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, without distinction of party, were well understood to be most emphatic. Had the matter been within the proper cognizance of Congress, each House would have voted for a change by a large majority, wherein the most influential and zealous opponents of the rebellion, Democrats as well as Republicans, would have voted.

"That the President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of our armies, and he, after hearing everything, concluding all that was urged on both sides, decided against a change."

At last, we have the written confession, from the Secretary of War, the Chandlers, and Wades, and Julians on the Congress war committee, that they did not get Gen. McClellan out of the way, and that they became General Fremont in!—N. Y.

RELIABLE NEWS.

BALTIMORE, March 29, 1862.
Mr. Geo. Pearson—Dear Sir: Being troubled with a severe SORE THROAT and COLD (which settled on my lungs), I tried your MEDICATED TAR DROPS, and can speak very flatteringly of their having relieved me in a few hours, and curing me in three or four days. I cheerfully recommend your justly celebrated Tar Drops to all similarly affected, who will find them pleasant, simple, very efficacious, and the cheapest remedy I ever used. Yours, very truly,
W. HARRISON HOBBES,
