THE GREAT GUN QUESTION.

A smooth-bore gun has been made by Sir W. Armstrong, length fourteen feet, weight twelve tons, and it was tried against the Warrior target on Tuesday, the 8th inst., at Shoeburyness, in presence of the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Somerset, and other high officials of the Admiralty and War-Office. From a long descriptive article upon the experiment, in the Army and Navy Gazette of the following Saturday, we make the subjoined extracts:

"It cannot be forgotten that the very high opinion which has been formed of the vast strength of the Warrior is attributed to the endurance which this supposed part of her exhibited against solid smashing 68-pounders and sharp penetrating rifle shot at this particular trial. The victory was then looked upon as complete, and Sir W. Armstrong was supposed to have done his worst and failed. He was not, however, to be so easily vanquished; he merely asked for time and patience, and has now proved that he was not wrong in seeking for indulgence. A cast-iron shot weighing 156 lbs., with a charge of 40 lbs. of powder, was fired from the 300 pounder 10½ inch bore (smooth bored) at a range of 200 yards against this now celebrated Warrior target. The shot did not actually penetrate the armor, but partially lodged in it, cracking and destroying the face of the plate and presenting behind a scene of havoc difficult to describe.

"The plate was bulged in, the teak pounded into an almost impalpable powder, rivets and bolts started, ribs bent, and the skin cracked. A second shot was fired precisely similar to the first, and imbedded itself not far from the spot where the first struck. The plate was again unpowerated, but the wreck behind was greater than in the other case, the ribs of the ship being completely smashed, and the ground literally covered with splinters to some considerable distance behind. It was then resolved to increase the charge to 50 lbs. of powder, and the shot was aimed at a part of the target which had not been previously assailed. Here there was no mistake; a clean hole was made through the structure, plate and shot going bodily together to the rear. The effect produced on the teak was very strange, large quantities of it being cut into pieces as clean as if they had been split by a knife or hatchet. A second shot, with a similar charge, was then fired at a lower part of the target, which also had escaped from the effects of all previous firing, and with a similar result, as again did the shot show daylight through the structure; and we can only come to the conclusion that if the Warrior had been exposed to such a formidable fire, her main deck would have exhibited a terrible display of carnage and confusion, and that if the shot had taken effect below her water-line, it would have been impossible to have plugged the holes which had been made, and the ship would in all probability have sunk.

"The trials on this target then ceased, sufficient having been shown to convince any reasonable-minded man that artillery was again in advance of iron-plates, and that any attempt on the part of the Warrior to accept a challenge from an enemy armed with these 300-pounders, as unquestionably may be the case, would be attended with rapid and total destruction.

* * * "We may gather from the results of these expensive and important experiments, conducted under the Iron-Plate Committee, that whenever we have been ready to jump to the conclusion that we have hit upon a powerful resisting object, and have felt inclined to defy the prowess of Sir W. Armstrong, the latter has always in the quietest and meekest of manners coolly produced a gun (whether his own or not it is not now our object to inquire) which has at once set us thinking upon some other mode by which we might defy him.

* * * "We do not pretend to decide in the matter. The question, as it strikes us, is more one of practice than one of theory. We are, however, positive on one point—a target placed at an angle, clothed with 4½-inch plates, did successfully resist Sir W. Armstrong's 100-pounder, fired under the superintendence of Captain Hewlett, at Portsmouth; and one with plates of a similar thickness, placed upright, did fail to do so at Shoeburyness. Nay, the almost irresistible Sir William went through a mass of six-inch iron, arranged in a like manner to the turret of the Monitor, as one might poke a finger through a piece of ripe Stilton.

"It appears to be settled that we are to have a certain number of floating batteries for the protection of our arsenals and other valuable spots; and the sloping or angulated principle has been adopted in the construction of Capt. Coles' cupola shields, we cannot for one [illegible] Plymouth breakwater Spithead, or kept ready for use in harbor, could not be turned out of hand. The objections now raised against ships of the kind are that they would be dangerous to life in a seaway. Well, let these objections stand good, but there can be none against their being tried as smooth-water batteries; they would be cheaper than forts, equally strong if not stronger, and with the advantage of being movable and being maintained at less cost."

Sir W. Armstrong has a letter in the Times, explaining the principle which has rendered the last experiment successful in penetrating and smashing iron plates. The smooth bore gun has a velocity excelling that of the rifle gun, at short range.

GARIBALDI IN MILAN.

The Milan Gazette, of the 22d March, gives the following account of the scene which took place in that city on the visit of Garibaldi:—

The train bringing General Garibaldi arrived here yesterday at eleven o'clock. As soon as the General got out and saw the immense multitude, which looked like a sea in a tempest, he at once expressed a fear of a repetition of the scene of Genoa. "They will greatly annoy me," said he, "if they attempt to detach the horses." His fear was not unfounded, for the traces had been already cut. It was a full quarter of an hour before he could leave the station, and more than an hour before he arrived at the hotel. Torches, transparencies, flags and musical bands preceded him; a living wall hemmed in the carriage, which could only proceed a yard at a time; there was but one cry, one acclamation, as from time to time the hymn of Garibaldi merged into an indescribable burst of enthusiasm.

At midnight the general reached the hotel, and descended in the midst of the crowd which had invaded the court-yard, and crowded forward only to touch the edge of his dress. Summoned by universal applause, the general appeared in a few minutes on the balcony, dressed in his magic red shirt. He rested his left arm upon the railing of the area, and with his right hand he took off his Catalan cap, and fixing a calm look upon the crowd, he made a signal for silence. At last a profound hush ensued. Then was heard the liquid, metallic, sonorous, and enthralling voice of the general, and from his short pauses it was perceived that he expressed his thoughts as they arose in his mind and heart.

"I greet you," he said, "People of the Five Days! I congratulate myself on being in this city, which contains so many of my companions in arms.—Hail, people of Milan! Some years have passed since you taught Italy how to get rid of the enemies!" (We have italicised those words because the general uttered them very quickly after having sought in vain for other language. It is evident that at the bare idea of Austrians, and all other enemies of Italy, the soul of Garibaldi is in a flame, and he can find no other terms than those which anger suggests. "Milanese," continued Garibaldi in the midst of constant interruptions, "I congratulate myself with you; you seem to me to-day a people capable not only of a Five Days, but of a Twenty-five;" and, hearing at this moment the cries of Rome and Venice, which rose on all sides, "Yes, Rome and Venice," continued the general, waving his hat, "Yes, Rome and Venice; he who thinks we have forgotten them strangely deceives himself. Milanese! You will not be the last! (A Voice—'No, the first.') You will be among the first to deliver our enslaved sisters."

The shouts which ensued prevented us from catching the exact sense of some other remarks from the General. "Only one word more," he added, "for it is cold, it rains, and my voice is failing me. I am amongst you to organize rifle shooting. My mission is to propagate the rifle. Practice, Milanese, with the musket. You already know how to manœuvre the bayonet—hey?" It is impossible to reproduce the accent, the intelligent expression, which he gave to this phrase. He soon after waved his hat once more, and withdrew.

This morning, at daybreak, a crowd assembled before the hotel, shouting "Viva Garibaldi!" and waiting for the moment when he would have to present with his own hand to the volunteers of the Southern army the medals which have been sent to them by the King. The crowd increasing every minute, the general was constrained to appear. He took off his hat to them and said a few words, which were almost lost in a thunder of applause. He immediately retired, but the people, who seemed wild with delight, continued to call for him.—The general appeared again, and urged them to disperse, saying, "Thanks, thanks; we shall see each other again." All the shops in the city were closed, as during a fête.

THE PRUSSIAN NAVY.—The Cologne Gazette says: "It is positively asserted to-day that a project for a loan of 12,000,000 thalers, for naval purposes, will be presented to the Chamber of Deputies on its re-assembling, in May next. The money will be applied to the construction of two iron plated frigates, and several others of smaller size. The frigates will cost from three to four million thalers, and will probably be built in England, which possesses the best establishments for the manufacture of iron plates. In saying that fortresses are useless against iron-plated vessels, and that they will have to be plated also, the English and French journals put forward nothing new. Already the ramparts of Antwerp are protected by an iron roof, which has been constructed as to make the balls fly off."

RELIABLE NEWS.

BALTIMORE, March 29, 1862.

Mr. Geo. Pearson—Dear Sir: Being troubled with a severe SORE THROAT and Cold (which settled on my lungs), I tried your MEDICATED TAR DROPS, and can speak very flatteringly of their having relieved me in a few hours, and curing me in three or four days. I cheerfully recommend your justly celebrated Tar Drops to all similarly affected, who will find them pleasant, simple, very efficacious, and the cheapest remedy I ever used. Yours, very truly,
W. HARRISON HORNER,
