AMERICAN AFFAIRS IN EUROPE.

THE POSITION OF THE SOUTH.

From the London Herald, April 16

Nearly fourteen months have now elapsed since the representatives from seven of the States of the late American Union assembled at an obscure inland town for the purpose of forming a new Union, the old one having been repudiated and solemnly abjured by those States through conventions assuming to embody and wield the supreme will and sovereignty of their people. These States were speedily joined by others, with the same motives, until the revolution extended over nearly one-half of the United States and thirteen out of the fifteen States which, in the vocabulary of American politics, have always been collectively styled "the South." In less than a week from the first meeting of the Southern delegates at Montgomery a Provisional Government was framed, consisting of a President, Vice President, and one Legislative Chamber, to hold its power for one year from the date of its inauguration. At the same time the preliminary measures were taken to establish a "permanent" Government under a "permanent" Constitution, which was to supersede the provisional one after being ratified by the States, and its officers elected by the popular vote; in other words, after the experiment of revolution should be fairly tried and its chances of success demonstrated. This so-called permanent Constitution was an admitted improvement upon that of the United States, and was promptly ratified by the States which had confederated against the latter.

A war, straining every nerve of this infant body politic, did not cripple or retard its development and expansion in precisely the manner its sponsors had decreed beforehand. The overwhelming numbers of a powerful invader did not prevent the peaceful election, with all the formalities of law, by the Legislatures of the several States, and by the people, of senators to represent the former, and members of a lower house to represent the latter, and of a President and Vice President, clothed with the functions of the Executive office for six years. On the 18th of February last, when the powers of the Provisional Congress expired by limitation, its place was taken by a Senate and House of Representatives, whose authority their constituents consider to be as legitimately derived as that of the oldest Government on the civilized globe. Four days later, to make a coincidence of anniversaries, Messrs. Davis and Stephens were inaugurated as the first "President and Vice President of the Confederate States of America."

In the eyes of its citizens the new Republic is now no longer regarded as an experiment, but as an established fact. Fourteen months is a long period in the history of a people like the Americans; and the Southerners, having maintained their independence for that period, deem it conclusive evidence that they will always be able to maintain it. While we do not altogether concur in the logic of this conclusion, we cannot deny the great moral influence which a transition from a provisional to a "permanent" Government will exert on the progress of events. A provisional Government means attempted revolution; the permanent Government symbolises the success of the attempt. We have before adverted to the extreme difficulty, not to say impossibility, of subduing a people so numerous, and occupying so vast a territory as the Confederates, if such a people is really united in a desperate resistance. That they are so united their brief past tends strongly to prove. Their revolution seems to have been effected without internal commotion; and the old Government, which was supposed to have so strong a hold upon the affections of the masses, seems to have been shaken off with as much ease and unconcern as a worn-out garment would be by its wearer. The officers and employees of that Government, from the judge of a Federal circuit to the petty village postmaster, were continued in their functions with scarcely an exception, thus practically making the change less perceptible to that influential class than would have been the regular accession of a new incumbent to the Presidential chair of the undivided country. We have heard little of political arrests, and nothing of State prisons or passport annoyances. Among the prominent men of the new state of things there are few new names, and the adept in the mazes of American politics recognizes among these names a fair representation of all former political parties. The press, which is usually the first object of revolutionary surveillance, is, so far as we can judge at this distance, under less restrictions and more outspoken than that of the Northern States. The large levies which the revolution required districts most densely peopled with slaves, from where, by inference, the slave-holding interest might be supposed to be least deeply rooted. Yet there does not appear to have been much, if any, resort to conscriptions or impressments, and the militia has been called out only in a few denuded and suddenly threatened localities.

The slaves themselves, upon whom the Government at Washington so confidently relied as an element of success, have not only remained quiescent producers of food for the armies, but, according to the account of both contending parties, in many instances either accompany their masters to the field, or render useful service as spies on the movements of the Federal forces. Considering the small accumulated wealth of the South the voluntary contributions to the revolutionary Treasury have been astonishingly large, independently of the fact that the armies of the Confederation have been in a great measure raised, clothed, and even fed by individual patriotism. But if doubts are still entertained by the impartial spectator as to the unison of feeling with which all classes apparently support the revolution, its leaders may point with some show of force to the Government which is now in full operation, a Government deliberately planned a year ago, and which, in the minutest details of its machinery, had to undergo the crucial test of the ballot-box through which universal suffrage, in a multitude of local as well as general elections, could unrestrained express the prevailing sentiment of remote rural district or populous central town.

It must not be forgotten also that a revolutionary government which has once acquired this air of solidity and stability possesses many of the advantages, and is without some of the disadvantages, of an old established one. It rallies around it the mass of the timid and hesitating, whose timidity and hesitation ensure their allegiance. In the case of the Confederate States the very desperateness of their struggle supplies them with resources which, perhaps, they could not have found in a well-filled treasury and amply-stocked arsenals. Such is the nature of this war that every man's fortune and the solvency of every corporation are more or less directly dependent upon the permanency of the incoming Government, and that Government in addition to the popular enthusiasm which supported its predecessor, may, therefore, rely upon the more ignoble but less evanescent motives which control human actions in the main. It is true that few nations have ever succeeded in creating an independent existence when altogether left to their own resources. Infancy, both of a nation and an individual, needs the fostering care of others to ripen into vigorous life, and in either case the new-born Hercules crushing the serpent in his cradle finds few analogies.

This fostering care, in the shape of timely assistance, has usually been supplied to nascent nations by the self-interest, the policy, or the ambition of older sisters; and it has seldom been required of the new comer, as a proof of her right to exist, that she should exhibit the strength of full maturity, able to defend itself against all assailants. Judged by this test, many would lose the right to live which is now unanimously accorded to them. Had so rigid a rule been applied, the two most memorable national contests of modern times might have had a very different termination. Despite their heroic resolves and deeds the Netherlands would not probably have triumphed over the then gigantic power of Spain without the moral support of all Protestant Europe, and the "material aid" of men and money from England and Germany. The United States would scarcely date their independence from 1776 had not France and her allies endorsed the declaration of that independence—at first by surreptitious but valuable favors, and ultimately by the whole power of their armies and navies. In each of these cases the aid was granted when the cause which asked it seemed most desperate, and therefore most in need of aid. It cannot long be withheld in the struggle that is now desolating the continent of North America.

MARINE LOSSES FOR APRIL.—We publish our monthly statement of marine losses for the past month, showing an aggregate of forty vessels, of which two were steamers, four were ships, seventeen were barks, four were brigs, and thirteen were schooners. Of this number, nine were abandoned at sea, three foundered, one sunk after collision, ten are missing, and seventeen were lost by going ashore, &c. The total value of the property lost and missing is one million two hundred and twenty-four thousand seven hundred dollars.—This is the value of the property totally lost, exclusive of damage to vessels not amounting to a total loss.—N. Y. World.

ARREST OF RADINSKY, THE ALLEGED MURDERER OF FELDNER.—Telegraphic information was received at the headquarters of the Metropolitan police last night, direct from the authorities of St. Louis, Missouri, stating that Radinsky, the supposed murderer of Mr. Feldner, who disappeared early in the fall of last year, and whose body was subsequently found on the Jersey shore, has been arrested.—This case, it will be remembered, occasioned considerable excitement at the time of Mr. Feldner's murder, and a sister of Mrs. Marks, alleged to have been one of the principals in the dark transaction, committed suicide. Radinsky will be brought to this city for trial.—N. Y. Herald.

The New York ice companies have stored 400,000 tons of ice, but the crop, although larger than that of last year by 2,500 tons, is not expected to realize as large an amount on the scales as the crop of 1861. Two millions of dollars are said to be invested in the ice trade of New York.

The French war steamer Labradore, from Havana, arrived at New York on Wednesday evening, and anchored off the Battery.

The late Consul of the United States at Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, Mr. Daniel M. Huckins, died at that place on the 15th of February last.

RELIABLE NEWS.
BALTIMORE, March 29, 1862.
Mr. Geo. Pearson—Dear Sir: Being troubled with a severe SORE THROAT and Cold (which settled on my lungs), I tried your MEDICATED TAR DROPS, and can speak very flatteringly of their having relieved me in a few hours, and curing me in three or four days. I cheerfully recommend your justly celebrated Tar Drops to all similarly affected, who will find them pleasant, simple, very efficacious, and the cheapest remedy I ever used. Yours, very truly,
W. HARRISON HORNER,
