PROSPECTS FOR CHEAP COTTON IN INDIA.

From the London Times, June 12.

People who hold the common notions of India which obtain in England must have been a little startled by a sentence in our Calcutta correspondent's letter which we printed yesterday. He tells us that "the supply of cotton from Central India must long be limited, from the want of labor." This is about the last want which popular estimation attributes to India. We can all believe in want of capital, want of industry, want of railways, want of irrigation, want of everything, except only the want of population. It has always been our habit to look upon India, with its hundred and fifty millions of human beings, as a region of the earth so densely peopled that human life was itself the great obstacle to human advancement, and the overcrowding of the species was the curse of the race. Any one who would take away a cargo of Coolies from the coast was supposed to be a benefactor to India. Even when we heard of some terrible pestilence or some frightful famine, although we rushed to relieve it to the fullest extent of our power, yet we suspect that there mingled with our commiseration an unconscious idea of a compensating good. We silently believed the survivors would ultimately gain by the catastrophe, and we were tacitly convinced that those who were perishing were but the excess of a population too great for the land to support. As we come to know India better, we abandon one by one nearly all the popular notions which were prevalent here during the time of the Company; and we discover every day with a new surprise that those things we had thought most indisputable are most certainly fallacious.

Not only is India underpeopled, if we compare her present population with her possibilities of production, but even in her present underpeopled state she has no hands to spare. What she might be in the way of populousness, if her vast alluvial plains were all irrigated, if her jungles were cleared, if security were given to capital, and if water and railway communications gave free action to commerce, it would be scarcely profitable to speculate; India under those conditions would probably even surpass in density of population those crowded provinces on the Eastern coast of China, where, for lack of good government, and only for lack of good government, humanity becomes congested and festers. It would be long, however, before India could ever reach a pass such as this. Our correspondent attributes the scantiness of the population in Central India to the devastation of the Mahrattas, and that of Eastern Bengal to the incursions of the Burmese. The population must indeed be sparse over which such distant events could exert so durable an influence. The important matter, however, is that the fact really does exist. An unimportant insurrection in the Jyntea Hills in Eastern Bengal has required the presence of some of our military men to conciliate the chiefs, to redress the grievances of the reasonable, and to punish the obstinate.

This necessity has drawn the attention of the Indian public at once to the beauty and to the desolation of a region so comparatively near to Calcutta, and yet so little known. There are in this province 43,000 square miles of valleys and glens resembling those of Scotland, but infinitely more fertile; and all this region is possessed by a population of some 2,000,000 souls. It can not only grow tea and corn, but it does, unfortunately for its inhabitants, grow too much opium. It produces the finest oranges and potatoes, and is, moreover, one mass of lime, coal and iron. It is a treasure of vegetable and mineral wealth. Yet in this region there is upon an average only two human beings to every 43 square miles—and we have allowed ourselves to believe that India is overpeopled!

The remote analogy presented by India. All the diseases that are supposed to be in and like this are equally manifestable in a country where resources are not in an appreciable degree developed. But, even if we take these points where the human weed is thought to grow most rank, you will find, or find it, begin to make any demand upon the labor market, that the average time there is not a man to spare. Even upon those coasts of India where the Hindoos were found in multitudes existing as starvation point, and where it was believed to be such great charity to take them away to good land and good wages in another sphere of labor, the real redundancy was found to be very small.—Although we know the actual requirements of the Mauritius, we have not been sufficiently acquainted with the population and their poverty soon ceased to supply emigrants. If the enterprise was pushed after the natural supply had ceased, and if the temptation to emigrate was made very strong, more hands were indeed obtained, but the district itself was left desolate.

Similar experiments have been followed with the same result in every part of India. The call made by the railways upon the labor market, which might have been considered inappreciable in a mass of 150,000,000, has not only more than doubled the price of labor in the districts traversed, but has also operated to nearly the same effect at great distances. Wherever European capital appears in India the price of labor at once rises, and the Indian workman is at this moment in the receipt of a wage, which, whether reckoned by money or by the necessaries it will buy, is greatly superior to any scale known to former generations. Still, no doubt, labor in India is very cheap when measured by the rates which rule in Europe and America. But, if the Indian is of such simple and inexpensive habits that he can live and labor for a comparatively small stipend, it must be remembered that he is also not a very profitable servant. A great many men are required in India to do a very moderate amount of work; and if we are to develop the riches either of Assam, or of any other district of that land, we cannot do it with only one human being to twenty square miles of country.

From the New York World, June 28.

THE REPULSE AT CHARLESTON.

Treading close on the heels of Secretary Stanton's inglorious campaign in the Valley of the Shenandoah, we have now, for the further encouragement of the Confederates, an illustration of the value of the only strategy which he recognizes—that of marching straight upon the works of the enemy. This ill-timed movement cannot be charged on General Hunter; it was in violation of his express orders. General Hunter is a soldier; he knows that the success of troops depends on the skill with which they are handled; his military judgment is too good to take any great risks in a disorganized and disconnected operation, while so much is staked on the main movement before Richmond. General Benham's violation of orders and rash attack on the Confederate batteries, may be fairly regarded as one of the fruits, if not of Mr. Stanton's anti-strategic order, certainly of the same order of military ideas. Benham had been ordered, through the Adjutant General, to report at Washington; he stated in this city yesterday that the order had reached him previous to the affair on James Island. This statement was made, as we understand, for the purpose of showing that the order did not proceed from General Hunter, and was not a consequence of the disaster. If he succeeded, he probably expected to wipe out the discredit of his recall; and for the disobedience of orders, he could have pleaded that he had proceeded in strict accordance with Secretary Stanton's military ideas.

This repulse is of minor consequence, except as it gives heart to the Confederates. But in this view it is much to be regretted. The retreat, so rapid as to amount to a flight, of General Banks, and the failure of the resulting campaign against Jackson—a failure publicly confessed by the promotion of Gen. Pope—tended to revive the drooping hopes and re-invigorate the morale of the Confederate army. Their success on James Island will add further rekindle their confidence, and make their resistance more determined at Richmond. Gen. Benham's attack is a costly and inexcusable blunder.

Until the fate of the Confederate capital is decided, no risks should be incurred, or doubtful operations be undertaken, except in support of Gen. McClellan, or for the purpose of intercepting the retreat of the enemy, and taking advantage of the victory, after the fall of Richmond. When Richmond is taken, many less important positions will fall into our hands of themselves. No General is justified in squandering precious lives in premature attempts to pluck fruit which, if let alone till it ripens, will fall into our lap by the law of gravity. While the fate of Richmond hangs vibrating in the scales, Charleston will be resolutely defended. As long as the rebellion has a single leg to stand on, it will run great hazards to retain at least one important seaport.

New Orleans is lost, and next to New Orleans Charleston is the most important exporting city in rebeldom. If, by some turn in the wheel of fortune, foreign powers should raise the blockade, the Confederates feel that they cannot afford to be in a position to derive no advantage from its withdrawal. The commercial importance of Charleston, its railroad communications with the interior, and the great strength of its fortifications, are reasons why it, above all the sea-board cities of the South, will be vigorously defended to the last. In the order of strategic movements economy of forces requires that the fall of Charleston shall follow, not precede, that of Richmond. There is, of course, no danger of a repetition of this rash attempt, which never would have been made at all had General Hunter's orders been followed. Judging from the present aspect of the facts, General Benham ought to be cashiered for misconduct.

SHIELDS AND McDOWELL.

Winchester Correspondence New York World.

It is stated as a notorious fact that Gen. Shields, in a personal altercation with his superior, Gen. McDowell, at Front Royal, drew his sword upon him and made use of very violent and uncomplimentary epithets, and that in the course of his remarks he alluded to his favorite theme, the battle of Winchester, and placed it in invidious contrast with the battle of Bull Run. The following is the language which was used, as reported: "General McDowell, you have fought your maiden battle, and I have fought mine. Yours was at Bull Run, and mine was at Winchester."

GEO. PEARSON, ESQ.

Dear Sir—I feel it a duty to express to you my sincere acknowledgements of the benefit derived from the use of a package of your MEDICATED TAR DROPS

I was suffering with a SEVERE COUGH and SORE THROAT, when a friend presented me with a package of your celebrated TAR DROPS, and when I used them, I was free to confess it was more to gratify my appetite for sweetmeats than the idea of deriving any good from them; but really, the rapid allaying of the irritation and subsequent entire cure of the cough, induces me to thank you, and I take great pleasure in recommending to the public so effective a compound. Respectfully yours, J. S. SMITH, M. D., Assistant Surgeon Artillery Brigade U. S. A.

PEARSON'S MEDICATED TAR DROPS are prepared and sold by GEO. PEARSON, No. 5 North Liberty street, Baltimore, at 10 cents per package. Sold also by all the principal Druggists. Je21 tf

THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS PARTIALLY RESTORED.—After an involuntary absence of about three months, during which time we were made familiar with the classic and once hallowed grounds of Fort McHenry—we again resume, partially, our old vocation of "enlightening the world with lamp-black." Our Press, being deemed dangerous by the Government, has been kindly limited, and, for the future, instead of publishing "The South, or any other paper, without consent of the Commanding General," we shall modestly labor in the humbler department of the "art preservative of all arts," by executing every description of BOOK AND JOB PRINTING, hoping through that medium to sustain ourselves and those dependent upon us, and would earnestly appeal to our friends to favor us with their patronage. We have prepared our Job PRINTING DEPARTMENT to execute all kinds of printing neatly, expeditiously and cheaply, and solicit a call at our old buildings. SAMUEL S. MILLS,
