SECRETARY WELLES CHALLENGING ALL THE WORLD.

From the Manchester Guardian, 28th—Cotton Spinners' Organ.

If it were necessary to interpret the language of American Ministers by the same rules with those used in the old world, there is one portion of the intelligence brought by the Bohemian which might excite considerable uneasiness on our side of the Atlantic. If our First Lord of the Admiralty were suddenly to demand from Parliament the means of making a large addition to the navy, on the ground that war was on the point of breaking out, the whole country would be assured of the imminence of the danger, and animated by a desire to meet it in a most effectual manner. No one would feel a moment's doubt as to the seriousness of the crisis, however much opinions might differ respecting the blame of bringing it about. But expressions have not the same value in America. Whether from their inexperience in diplomacy, their scorn of established usages, or the want of official training by which their system condemns them, society is so that public men in the United States continually use language which is not meant to be taken in its ordinary sense. They speak and write like men who are conscious that there is no danger of their being believed.

But whether the American Government be sincere in its apprehensions or not, the message before us is sufficiently curious. It is clear that, so far as the civil contest is concerned, the Federal States require no addition to their naval force on the Mississippi. They are masters of the river from its sources to its mouth, and the peculiar character of the country through which it flows leaves little probability of their sovereignty being seriously disputed. Now we might suppose that this is not precisely the moment when the Washington authorities would embark in any course of expenditure not deemed absolutely unavoidable. We have just seen Mr. Secretary Chase forced to replenish his exhausted treasury by a new issue of inconvertible notes. We know that by his own showing the public debt of the Federal States was very nearly one hundred millions sterling at the end of May, and we have good reason to believe that this statement is far from including all the liabilities of the Government.

We know, moreover, that up to the latest date yet received, the House of Representatives had not accepted the Senate's amendments to the tax bill, and, although this obstacle may now have been overcome, we have very little expectation that the measure will ever be carried into practical effect.—Over all the thinly settled districts of the West, the tax collector's travelling expenses will alone exceed his receipts and the taxes will fail, in practice, only on the towns. Meanwhile, the premium on gold which we last week quoted at five per cent. had risen before the Bohemian sailed to seven and a half, and, of course, the Government notes were depreciated in a corresponding degree. The administration has, therefore, the most powerful motives to keep its expenditures at the lowest possible limit consistent with its maintenance of its lesane struggle for dominion. Yet this is the time which it selects to enter on a new and extensive field of outlay, wholly superfluous for its immediate object, and so justified as if it really sought a fresh quarrel. "It is a duty, as well as a necessity," says Mr. Welles, "to make the United States a great naval power."

We conceive that only a short time ago Americans would have deemed themselves insulted by a suggestion that their country was not a great naval power. "It is no longer doubtful," continues the Secretary, "that the future safety of America is dependent on her naval strength and efficiency." Not many Americans, we suspect, would have been found ready to admit, before the present war, that there was any want of security in these respects. "America can now commence the construction of a navy adapted to present times under as favorable circumstances as any other nation." If Mr. Welles simply means that no power has yet obtained too great a start in building iron-clad ships to be overtaken, he may be right; but we venture to think that nations which can build them without resorting to inconvertible notes, will still be found to possess a considerable advantage. These, however, together with that imminence of war which we mentioned before, are the arguments put forward by Mr. Welles to induce Congress to sanction the establishment of a new navy yard on the Mississippi

"Four years of war will not present an appearance so imposing nor usually prominent in American State papers. From the remarks we have just made, it might be considered a confession of weakness. But we fancy no Americans will regard it in that light. For them it will bear the other aspect which is plainly intended by the writer, and which is simply that of defiance. Mr. Welles is here challenging the whole world, just as he did England in the case of the Trent. To demand the means of meeting hostilities announced as impending is just to challenge the supposed foe to begin. If there is really no enemy now threatening the Federal Government, the challenge is only another instance of the empty bluster with which we are already too familiar. But if Mr. Wells is announcing a conclusion of the President's Cabinet formed on intelligence received from Europe, then, as we said in the beginning, we must feel a natural curiosity to know from what quarter the storm is expected. There have been rather contradictory statements made in this country as to the ability and the will of the Northern people to embark in a foreign war at the close of the present struggle.

We have been told that the latter will only come to an end, either by the exhaustion of the belligerents, or by the military occupation of the South; and yet that, whenever it ends, the North will have a large army ready for any conquest. It seems clear that the same exhaustion which would put an end to the civil conflict would prevent any foreign hostilities, and that an army which was garrisoning the South would not be available for any foreign campaign. But there is little security in these considerations. It is not easy to sound the depths to which selfish ambitions will reach when national passions are fully aroused. At the present moment the South must have reached a pitch of suffering far beyond any known in the North. Yet it shows no sign of faltering in its resolution. We have only to give the North credit for equal determination, to make it able to prolong the pending struggle, or even to supersede a new one. The Southern paper is much more depreciated than the Northern, yet it appears to serve its purpose. Repudiation may be certain when war peace arrives, and yet there may be no want of resources so long as war continues.

Where, then, is Europe, does the Federal Government expect to find a foe? Its conscience might point to this country; for it must know well that if one tithe of the provocation had been given to it by English cruisers which our merchant service has received from its vessels, although possibly without exceeding the strict rights of war, nothing could have prevented hostilities between the two nations. But by this time Federal statesmen must be well aware of the strong motives and deep feelings which make Englishmen desire, at any loss to themselves, to keep aloof from the American civil war. They seem, indeed, not only to know this feeling, but even to exult in putting it to trial in a way that may soon be carried too far. The recent language of our Ministers in Parliament, however, has shown that they do not contemplate the probability of war. The only other possible enemy seems to be France; and there certainly are signs that our neighbor may prove less reluctant to interfere than ourselves. The Mexican expedition offends all the traditions of the United States, and there have been some rumors, between noticed, not long ago, of a transaction between Napoleon and Jefferson Davis. Meanwhile, we have seen from some of the French journals that Admiral Jurien de la Gravière will return to the Gulf with orders to concentrate a powerful squadron in Mexican waters. Whether we have here the solution of Mr. Welles' anticipations, only time can show; but we may once more rejoice that we are free from all engagements with France in her American policy.

FEDERAL SUCCESSES WITHOUT TROOPS—DEMOCRATIC INSTITUTIONS CRITICISED.

From the London Morning Post (Palmerston Organ.)

A very cursory examination of the extensive frontier of the Southern Confederacy must satisfy even the most enthusiastic Unionist that, after having created a debt of two hundred and fifty millions sterling, after having ruined, perhaps for years, a considerable portion of the commerce of the Southern States, and after having excited a spirit of deadly hatred between those who aforetime were brothers, the North has only succeeded in effecting a few lodgments on the outskirts of their enemy's territory, which either considered commercially or strategically, are entirely valueless. It is impossible to conceive otherwise than that the great majority of thinking men in the Northern States must have long since become thoroughly convinced of the utter futility of the struggle in which they have so rashly engaged—Already murmurs, not loud, but deep, are making themselves heard above those frantic and senseless cries with which in all times democracies have equally cheered and goaded on the leaders of the hour.

The admirers of democratic institutions would do well to study attentively the history of the United States of America under the Presidency of Abraham Lincoln. Opportunities without number have presented themselves for testing the strength and the weakness of mob rule, and a man must be wilfully blind and stupidly perverse who cannot read and profit by the lessons which have been taught. Without proposing to enter into a politico-philosophical dissertation upon the respective excellencies of different forms of government, it may not prove uninteresting to examine in what respects the peculiar Government of the United States has proved itself to be unequal to the present occasion. As a general rule it may be stated that a democratic form of government fails when an extraordinary strain is cast upon the Executive. The ruling power does not become weaker, but it ceases to be exercised in the manner most conducive to the interests of the community. In a state of profound peace, and when neither foreign nor domestic complications disturb the general harmony, a demagogue is seen in its best colors. The Executive is called on simply to follow an established routine which experience has enabled all classes to agree in prescribing as best suited to the common weal. But let circumstances arise which necessitate a departure from that routine, and with no experience for a guide, the multitude are powerless, and incapable of indicating with judgment the course to be pursued.

In pure despotisms the ruler, under exceptional as under ordinary circumstances, decides on what seems best to be done. Unless a madman, he takes counsel of those whom he deems best to advise him. In limited monarchies, with representative governments, under such exceptional circumstances as we have noticed, the Executive is entrusted with the absolute power of deciding on the proper course to be pursued; nor does the deliberative element in the State, except indirectly, attempt to shackle that power. When it does so, it is after a prescribed and definite manner, which has at least the merit of clearly and unequivocally expressing the wishes of the assembly, and, by implication, of the State. But in a democracy, such as that which rules in America, the prerogatives which nominally reside in the Executive are at every instant exercised by the great mass of the people, and the ruler and his officials become puppets, the strings attached to which are pulled sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another, according to the continually shifting impulses of popular feeling. On no single occasion since the commencement of the civil war has Mr. Lincoln's Government pursued an independent course of action.

In the affair of the Trent it truckled to the mob, until both Government and mob found that the popular voice as at first expressed, was the voice of wisdom. In the prosecution of the present war, at the cost of so much treasure and the risk of disgraceful insolvency, the Federal Government, instead of listening to the words of the wise and prudent, has found ears alone for the senseless clamor of the unthinking many. It is impossible to take up an American newspaper without detecting the proofs of the grovelling homage which the Executive is content to pay to those whose moral tone does not enable them to detect the difference between mendacity and smartness. For whose benefit is it, let us ask, that Mr. Stanton gains so many victories on paper? For whose benefit are the despatches of general officers doctored before they appear in the public prints? Mr. Stanton would do well to recollect that the First Napoleon tried the experiment of attempting to effect conquest by publishing victories in his Gazettes, and utterly failed. The Federal War Secretary can scarcely hope to be able by this means to subdue the Southern States, and we are consequently driven to the conclusion that he is simply animated by the desire of keeping the American people in a good humor. The game is a dangerous one; popular smiles are proverbially uncertain; and should a day of retribution come, the State itself may be involved with the existing government in a common ruin. Self-interest should inspire caution, even if the details of patriotism are entirely unheeded.
