THE PAPER QUESTION AGAIN.

The New York Post continues, with the utmost ability and good sense, to discuss the question of paper and show the evil resulting therefrom. In Wednesday's issue it remarks:

In bowing to the present duty on printing paper the Government virtually addresses the publishers in the manner of Dogberry, we presume, you with the gift of twenty per cent. on the value of all the paper you make. It comes in part from the readers of newspapers, in part from the pockets of children attending the public schools, in part from poor scholars, in part from the Government at its ill, which puts into the tax bills and collects it from people. Receive this tribute in a generous country, which cheerfully imposes upon itself these great sacrifices on your account. Put it quietly in your pocket, and do not trouble yourself to make your paper any better or cheaper, unless you take a particular way to do so. If any person should be so simple-minded as to grumble, Mr. Henry Cary will assure him that it is all right.

Nevertheless, we suspect that if the duty be [illegible] there are a good many publishers in this community who will think that they have quite enough on their hands to engage with the Government at the present time, and have a little on the side of certain valuable articles which the war makes necessary without being able to spare time to hand up the free funds of the paper-making [illegible]. It would not be well, then, if they should be a little troublesome in appealing to Congress to repeal the duty which is while the war lasts, and [illegible] the duty all "illegal" subjects of complaint the publishers duty or paper making [illegible] [illegible] the capitals of Europe will [illegible] to crush out [illegible] capital of the art of the great manufacture, and substitute cheap substitutes which are now in important than it has been at any period of our history.

We [illegible] merely don't that any such result will follow, but we are as confident as we can be of any future event that paper will be [illegible] in all Europe to defy and outlive our American competition in the American market before [illegible] Six or seven years ago, the manufacture of nearly as much paper as was made in Great Britain and France put together, in Hoppmann's Cyclopedia of Commerce, the amount made in this country in 1860 was estimated at 270,000,000 pounds, and that of Great Britain and France combined at only 240,000,000 pounds, giving but a much less excess over our own product of paper. But now we make more paper in the United States than in both the countries.

The paper makers of Great Britain and France [illegible] the publishers of America.—They were [illegible] in our own market [illegible] publishers [illegible] Europe to defy and outlive our American competition in the American market before [illegible] Six or seven years ago, the manufacture of nearly as much paper as was made in Great Britain and France put together.
