BY JONAS GREEN & GEORGE SHAW For Publishing, by Subscription, A MUCH ADMIRED WORK, ENTITLED,

AN ESTIMATE OF THE RELIGION OF THE FASHION ABLE WORLD.

THIS much admired traft is reputed to be the production of the celebrated Hannah Moore, of THIS much admired trast is reputed to be the production of the celebrated Hannah Moore, of whose zeal for religion, and ability to explain and enforce its doctrines, her avowed works fornish an undeniable proof. It is not designed as an answer to the cavils and sneers of the insidel, but being addressed to those who profess to be, and may have persuaded enemelves that they are, christians, displays with admirable beauty of language & force of argument the essential distinction between the mere profession and the systematic practice of christianity—between that system of mere moral duties those "barren generalities," to which we are wont to pay our homage, and that comprehensive system of faith and doctrine which was revealed by the bessel Redeemer of man, and every part of which we, as his disciples, are equally bound to embrace and observe. This publication commences with a view of the present state of religion among a considerable part of the fathionable world, and contrasts the notions so prevalent in this "our day," with the opinions and practices of purer ages of christianity, when religion, such as it saught in the gospel, was the study, the delight and practice, of christians of every order of society; and when to expound its doctrines, to assert the sum of the professed to unfold, as well the causes as the conlequences of the present decline of vital religion, & the lamentable blindness and error of those who the civilian and the accomplifted gentleman. It proceeds to unfold, as well the causes as the contequences of the present decline of vital religion, & the lamentable blindness and error of those who profess to be of the disciples of Jesus, and yet "would be wise above what is written, of those who would make a religion for themselves and in so momentous a concern would set up a standard of right and wrong of their own formation," instead of accepting with humility that divine standard which has been set up for them. It teaches to avoid alike, the dangerous extremes of too much reliance upon the forms and ordinances of religion, and an utter disregard of them, and will turnish us with an answer to those who would exalt morality at the expense of religion, and would make the whole substance of the latter to consist in a pundual discharge of our social obligations, and perhaps now and then, an oftentatious display of our liberality; it will not endure that a right saith will furnish an apology for avicious life, nor admit that a christian life can grow upon a wrong faith. "It declares that christianity must be embraced entirely if it be received at all, it must be taken without mutilation as a perfess scheme in the way in which God has been pleased to reveal it." There is no separating the evidences from the doctrines—the doctrines from the precepts—be lief from obedience—morality from piety—the love of our neighbour from the love of God.
