It was the maxim of those men, too, this as support of the constituted authorities, and to attempt to draw from them the public confidence; was little short of treason. Notwithstanding all this, however, it was made manifest; at the very commencement of the session, that nothing was further from the views of the democratic members of the legislature, than to devise any effectoal means of protecting the state against invasion. They were as little disposed to do this as the general government. "Let the enemy lay waste the state, and letthe people suffer, but let us, (if we can) do something towards wriggling ourselves into power," Accordingly, the sole employment of the senate, and of their political brethren of the other house, and indeed out of the house too, has been to fasten upon the governor of the state charge of peculation, and to induce a belief, that his abominable council are so fond of robbing the treasury. that they would resolve to rob it, even without any profit to themselves.
