EXTRACT. How amiable the picture presented by sensibility in distress amiable, though tull of anguish. Yiew it at the bed or a dying friend.—Behold it committing the remains of that friend to the silent recess of the tomb. The affections bound, lacerated and bleeding, lie at the foot of death; the heart sur charged with anguists, eppears ready to burst charged with anguist, spears ready to oursits bands, while the strength & support of the whole man seem to mingle with the descending clay, & leave him weak, helpless & overcome. What callous heart but pays to this the tribute of sympathy! What stoic

Can friendship behold it without solicitude as well as an guish! Frail without solicitude as well as anguish? Frail as the summer bow, man bears not reiterat ed trasts in vain. He bendseven to the first stroke of adversity—the second finds less strength to combat; another, and another comps, and soon seek his place in vain.

But has distress no gensolation? the wonded heart no solace? Behold emanating from Heaven, the merciful daughter of Divinity—her countenance beaming convolution—see her support the sinking suffolation see her support the sinking sufferer; she binds up his b oken wounds and infuses into his soul a sweet tranquility— cheerfulness once more lights up its ray the eye of faith rests on scenes beyond the present; beyond, the shadowy grave; while the renewed heart lifts its devout aspirations to the throne of God, and with pious hope ejaculates Thy will be done."

BXTRACT.

The feelings of the heart leave traces on the memory more sweet, as well as more fadelible, than any actions of the mind; & a glance of the eye which awakens one short of affection, conveys one new beam of hope of lights will be remembered when the propiles allies of intellect, the happiest with the memory of stocke of wit, are venished for ever.
