

earth which fills them must of necessity be alive and organized in the same manner as animals. Are not corresponding phenomena, results and objects, proof of the same nature, organs and properties? The earth must, however, be provided with much stronger organs than a woman, her procedure through the same being on a much more extensive scale."

Doctor Dwight's sermon on duelling.—Duty forbids us not to conceal, though we are utterly unable fully to express, the sensations we have experienced in the perusal of this admirable discourse. This sermon, though very lately printed, was preached last September, in the College Chapel at New Haven. "It was no part of the design of any observations made in it to refer to any particular events or persons."

"The sole object" of the preacher (as by himself expressed) "was to establish principles in the minds of his audience, and peculiarly of his pupils; and not at all to attack, or characterize persons."

Taking the following appropriate next, "A man that doth violence to the blood of any person, shall flee to the pit; let no man slay him"—the preacher exhibits to view, in a manner that would seemingly overpower any mind with conviction, the folly, the guilt, and the mischiefs, of duelling.

Before the stern and awful majesty of truth, the duellist stands appalled and confounded; the blood stained laurels are torn from his brow; his pleas and excuses vanish like vapours from the presence of the sun; his egotistical folly is made manifest; the rankness of his offence against God and man, is seen in the strong colours of reason and argument, aided by sublime eloquence.

In the mind of the reader, the alternate emotions of indignation and horror suddenly give place to the anguish of unavailing grief and compassion. The "uncovered coffin" appears to view: the bloody corpse is plainly seen. There is beheld a train of bereaved and broken hearted relatives—the father of the wretched victim of false honour, "fixed in motionless sorrow"—The mother "wrung with agony."

A group still more affecting is presented—the reader wets the page with tears. "Turn thine eyes, next" (solemnly exclaims the preacher to the bloody victim) "on that miserable form, surrounded by a cluster of helpless and wretched children, see her eyes rolling with palsy, and her frame quivering with terror. Thy hand has made her a widow and her children orphans. At thee, though unseen, is directed that bewildered state of agony. At thee she trembles; for thee she listens; lest the murderer of her husband should be now approaching to murder her children also."

"She and they, have lost their all. Thou hast robbed them of their support, their protector, their guide, their solace, their hope. In the grave all these blessings have been buried by thy hand."

The superior elegance of its language is but the smallest part of the merit which this discourse possesses. While it enchants attention, it informs the understanding; while it awakens the indignation and the sympathetic passions, it convinces the judgment and corrects the heart. In the clear and awful light of the sacred oracles, it displays the horrible turpitude, as well as the direful consequences, of the crime, which, in some parts of even this christian country, has been "vindicated, honoured, and rewarded, by common consent, and undignified suffrage," among those who filled the superior ranks of society."

We assume not the rank of reviewers; our sole object is to draw the attention of the numerous readers of our paper, (more especially our distant readers,) to this new publication, the general perusal of which might, in many instances, prevent the recurrence of the deplorable evils it describes.

[Com Courant.]

On a letter under the signature of Thomas Turner, which appeared in the Boston Repository of May 31.

The genius of federalism sleeps no longer. "Like another Lazarus it has risen from the tomb," in its genuine form, though with exhausted vigor. We are proud to behold it, in its native appearance. We hope that every man will mark the monster as it rises upon our view. Let every one behold the extremities of insatiation and fury, into which federal policy will hurry its partizans!

A new advocate has appeared upon the political theatre. His arguments are not drawn from the same inventive ingenuity, which distinguished the writings of Callender and Coleman. He professes to speak from the most respectable authority, and from original documents. We behold this champion in the person of Thomas Turner, of Virginia; who without the desire of supporting a patriotic cause, wants the power to prop the tottering cause of federalism.—Let this gentleman beware, that Sir William Draper is not the only man who may hereafter be called "the bitterest enemy of his friends."

"And what does Mr. Turner say? With a powerless hand he once more launches the pointless arrows which have been levelled at Mr. Jefferson's character. He once more rehearses the long list of personal accusations, which have emanated from the lips of Callender and Coleman. He touches upon Mr. Jefferson's conduct during the revolution; his encouragement of Callender's book, and the remission of his fine! He expatiates upon his attempt to seduce the wife of Col. John Walker; he enters into the recital of Mr. Jefferson's family for accidental accusation and he winds up the caustrophe with his conduct to Mr. Gabriel Jones.

The reader is mistaken if he expects me to enter into a long and tedious elucidation of those various events. These accusations are supported by no new matter; they demand no new refutation. Every republican of Virginia must believe them incorrect in fact or inference. Lest however the lame means of information may not exist in the distant scene, where these charges are divulged, and are intended to operate; we shall throw all the documents on this subject together, and transmit them for insertion in a Boston paper.

Respecting the only charge which Mr. Turner has attempted to elucidate by new matter, we would ask him where was the justice or propriety of his proceedings? if he could prove the mediated induction of Mrs. Walker, by the original correspondence of Messrs. Jefferson and Walker, why did he not produce it? Did the same inducements operate upon him which a few years since, and after a deliberate consultation produced their suppression? Was Mr. Turner afraid lest it should carry upon the face of it the justification of Mr. Jefferson! Was it proper for him to come upon the theatre, and lift up just as much of the curtain, as is sufficient to display the faults of his opponent, while he hides every thing from our view which would soften or remove their enormity? It is beneath us to take notice of these mutilated statements. Let him come out with his documents, and we will attempt to reply to him. We shall see whether there is not something to be found in the body of them, or in other sources, which may apologize for the failings of Mr. Jefferson. We shall then see whether he is that "distinguished prodigal" whether his conduct has been "marked by that extensive, continual, and deliberate villainy," which Messrs. Park and Turner have blazoned forth.

David M. Randolph, esq. late marshall of Virginia, has taken with him for the use of Mr. Turner. "He could unfold tales which would cause Mr. Jefferson to tremble." Away with such oblique and equivocal assertions! Let these gentlemen exert such ambush fighting! Let them initiate if they can, the more honorable examples of civilized warfare, and unfurl their banners in the face of heaven!!

STATES OF PARTIES.

It is doubtless a source of high gratification to those who revere civil liberty, that though the principles by which our independence was a heaven remained obscured for an inconsiderable period, they now resume their influence with redoubled lustre. The few who still remain in opposition to the national will are too insignificant in numbers and resources to excite a momentary apprehension for our rights and liberties, provided a watchful eye is kept over them.

The following is a comparative view of the strength of parties which will compose the ninth Congress: they speak a powerful language to the advocates of energetic government:
