fice.

From the NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

It can scarcely have escaped the notice of our readers, that, notwithstanding the loud and incessant denunciations of the administration for not adequately protecting the commerce of the country, measures have no sooner been taken with this view, than they have met with the ridicule and condemnation of those who were previously the most clamorous for them.

Some time since, it was determined by the administration to make an experiment of the efficacy of gun-boats.
The experience of older nations had shewn them to be of much use, and circumstances peculiarly applicable to the United States seemed to recommend them to us. A small appropriation was accordingly made for this purpose, and a number of gun-boats built on approved models.

The professed friends of commerce and avowed enemies of the administration, denounced the measure as weak and ridiculous. They denied the efficacy of gun-boats, and ridiculed the plan on which they were built. The administration, on their part, made no boasts.
They acknowledged that they were making an experiment, which might disappoint their hopes. This, it might have been expected, would have been felt by their opponents as a generous appeal to their candor. It might have been presumed that before the experiment was made, they would not have impeached the motives in which it was originated. It might have been presumed that they would have suspended their decision, or at least have withheld their clamors, for a few months, that a fair opportunity might be afforded to the friends of the measure to disclose their plan. No such forbearance was, however, manifested. Unqualified condemnation and sarcasm overwhelmed the measure and its projectors. The exclusive friends of commerce, jealous, as it were, of receiving any effectual protection from those whom their prejudices had converted into enemies, could see in the measure nothing but a settled hostility to commerce, a deliberate purpose, under the pretext of aiding, to cramp commercial enterprise, and to prevent any effectual protection being given to it.

It so happening, that the chief magistrate was a man of philosophic re-ard, and of course less habituated to servile imitation, than to the adoption of whatever appeared on reflection most advisable, the models on which the boats were constructed were represented by those who were supremely ignorant of the common principles of mechanism, as totally inadequate and impracticable. The lowest species of art, characterised by mean and indecent allusion, was resorted to. Why? Because the approved model did not precisely correspond with that of English gun-boats. For it must have been remarked that on most occasions, the professed friends of commerce have allowed all the credit to Great Britain, which they have denied to their own country.

Well, the administration, amidst the incessant fire of the enemy, advanced to their object without returning the charge. They thought that the measure would speak for itself; or, if it did not, nothing which they could prematurely say would justify it. The gun-boats were built, and the experiment tried. A number of them have crossed the ocean, and although they have encountered tempestuous weather, they have arrived at their destined stations.
In connection with the larger vessels, they have struck terror into the breasts of the enemy, have commanded peace, and have effected the liberation of our citizens. And, what is still more wonderful, such is their construction that even Englishmen are the first to approve and acknowledge them to be models of imitation, as well as greatly superior to their own gun-boats. Blush, Americans, at being surpassed in candor to your own government, by a nation, once your enemy and still your rival, by a nation whose arrogance rarely condescends to acknowledge equality, much less superiority in any one.

Here then is the just revenge of our administration, a revenge the more honorable, because unsullied by the indulgence of angry or vindictive feelings.
As far as time and occasion have allowed, the triumph is complete.

Of the untoward spirit of the enemies of the administration, we have another not less conspicuous proof. In consequence of the depredations committed on our trade, and the insults and outrages offered in, or near our harbors, and of the loud complaints of our merchants, several armed vessels have been stationed on the coast. But no sooner has this measure been taken, than they, who most strenuously urged it, are the first to demand its use. What, it is enquired, can this force effect? It is acknowledged that it may prevent the vessels of belligerent powers from actually entering our harbors, and there committing outrage and depredation; but what security does it afford against the capture of our merchantmen a marine league beyond the shore and within sight of our ports? Do either the laws of nations, or our treaty stipulations, authorize outraging, under these circumstances, our resistance to the right of search, or to the sending our vessels into the ports of the belligerent nations for goods.
