The room is full of people—hundre is of them—well dressed, intelligent looking and quiet. No reception of half the number of guests was ever half so still; a loud voice would be noticeable. Two things are conspicuous by their absence; laughter and children. People are too anxious to laugh; too wise to bring their little ones—even if it were allowed.

You come to something which looks like an overgrown billiard table with smooth edges; a score of people sit around it, interspersed with six employers of the establishment. Many others stand behind them; the majority of them are

Bill Nye Out West. When I was out West, writes Bill in the New York World, I was calling at the First National Bank of Chicago, the greatest bank, if I am not mistaken, in America. I saw the bonds occuring its issue of national currency the other day in Washington, and I am quite sure the custodian told me it was the greatest of any bank in the Union. Anyway, it was sufficient, so that I felt like doing my banking business there

I asked for a certificate of deposit for $2,000, and had the money to pay for it, but I had to be identified. "Wny." I said to a receiving teller, "surely you don't require a man to be identified when he deposits money?"

"Yes, that's the idea."

"Well, ins't that a new twist on the crippled industries of this country?" crippled industries of this country?"

I go all over Chicago, visiting all the pork packing houses in search of a man I know, and who is intimate with literary people like me, and finally, we will say, I find one who knows me and who knows you, and whom you know, and who can leave his leaf-lard long enough to come here and identify me all right. Can you identify yourself in such a way that when I put in my $2,000 you will not loan it upon insufficient security, as they did in Cincinnati the other day, as soon as I go out of town?
