

was sufficiently grave to call for public censure they should have been discharged.

The latest flank attack on the civil service commission is the determination of quite a number of members of the House, some democrats and some republicans, to attempt to kill the appropriation for the support of the Commission. It will hardly succeed.

The Montana contested election case promises to remain "unfinished business" in the Senate almost as long as did the Blair educational bill. The result is not in doubt that was settled by the report of from Penn-... presence... wild... rumors to... hood of the... presence... of the... Mr. Quay is not a talkative man, but he undoubtedly enjoys this political distinction, and the newspaper men enjoy it too, because it enables them when facts are dull to write the most sensational stories about Mr. Quay's future intentions.

appointed. The Commission last Tuesday, April 1, made the following appointments of tax-collectors: First district, Wm. R. Leagar, vice L. C. Benton; second district, Chas. E. Smith, reappointed; third district, John W. Tarmaa, reappointed; fourth district, Theodore A. Tolson, vice W. C. Legg; fifth district, Wm. B. Price, vice James E. Marshall; sixth district, Samuel Roe, reappointed; seventh district, no applicant.

One of our exchanges from Caroline county, contains the following: "A barber in Easton said he had to charge Caroliners extra this season for a shave but that by June 1st, the price would be the same as usual. The reason given was on account of so many hering bones in the skin that it used his razor up completely. The reporter remarks that, for he is a Caroliner himself."

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

On the... that they... above all debts... less than the following...

B. Brown, W. H. Newman, Busted and R. T. Earle, W. Finley, $35,000; James Brown, $20,000; J. H. Hall, $40,000, and Judge J. M. Robinson, $25,000. J. B. Brown is Senator from Q. A. Co. and brother of the Treasurer; W. H. Newman is a prosperous farmer; W. W. Busted, real estate agent; R. T. Earle, successful farmer, son of the late Judge Earle; W. Finley is a farmer and surveyor of the port of Baltimore in Buchanan's time; J. Brown, a distant relative of the Treasurer, is a farmer; J. H. Hall is a merchant and miller, and Judge Robinson is on bench of the Court of Appeals.

May Term Jurors. Hon. J. M. Robinson, last Friday, drew the following jurors to serve for the coming term:

First District—James Merrick, J. Morling Sudler, S. Sturgis Goodhand, John E. Everett, James E. Stevens, Edward K. Coppage, Benj. Wilson, Eugene W. Cooper, Joseph E. Wilson, Joseph E. Smith, J. Frank Barwick. Second District.—Wm. H. Smith of G. Thomas H. Walls, Thos. J. Tucker, Daniel S. Leller. Third District.—C. H. Clash, John Emory of Wm., John K. Skinner, W. J. Price, R. M. Price, W. T. P. Turpin, Stephen L. Wright, A. H. Wright, Richard Holliday, Harry R. McFeely, Jas. Tilghman and Richard T. Earle.

Fourth District—Henry A. Falmer, Jr., Emory S. Skinner, W. P. Tanner, Thomas W. Carville, Jas. D. Carville, and James E. Kirwan. Fifth District—William J. Embert, R. B. Carmichael, W. M. Armstrong, John Bishop, Jacob Shahan, Wm. H. Denny, Wm. F. Bailey, George De-Rochbrune and Wm. F. Ford. Sixth District.—Francis Turner. Seventh District.—Wm. C. Robinson, P. Bowers, John T. Rutter, Jos. Mallieu and H. Clay Hendrix.

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

Pass—T... Tableau—... Tableau—... Duett—M... Lolita David... Oh... the Cold Blast and Life's O'er.

Tableau—Gypsy Scene. Tableau—Good Night.

A Great Factor. Encouragement of home enterprise is the greatest factor in creating the prosperity of the town. Men are spurred to greater action by the evidence of the appreciation of their progressive spirit. It is a common mistake to decry this or that article because it was made at home, and the continual talk of the wonderful things one can see in some distant and much larger place. To those thus afflicted we would say do not again repeat that ancient phrase: "Oh! I know I can get it here, but I'll wait till I go to the city. City things always have such a stylish air you know." Remember at such times what your own town would be without the efforts of the men who are doing business in your community and who have embarked their all in the fortunes of your home. Take them away and you would have just cause to go away for what you need. The merchants of our little town are intelligent, liberal minded men, and to their efforts is due, in a great measure, the prosperity it now enjoys. Therefore, encourage them, purchase from them, patronize them and business will be stimulated, new enterprises started, mechanics steadily employed, soon the entire community will be one of activity and business.

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."

under the... for the in... Those in... following requ...

TRADER... The amount to be paid... sense of sale to be given un... follows: If the application's stock in trade... exceed $1,000... 15 50 Over 1,000 not over $1,500... 18 50 " 1,500 not over 2,500... 22 50 " 2,500 " 4,000... 28 50 " 4,000 " 6,000... 30 50 " 6,000 " 8,000... 40 50 " 8,000 " 10,500... 50 50 " 10,500 " 15,000... 65 50 " 15,000 " 20,000... 80 50 " 20,000 " 30,000... 100 50 " 30,000 " 40,000... 125 50 " 40,000... 150 50

The applicants must either make... as heretofore, before the Clerk of... cut Court of the county where... gaged in business of the am... kept on hand the principl... or the oath may be... tice of the Peace... a license appli... latter court... will be... the

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."

At a stand-still... shovels had heaped... and were running to the dam, shouting to the workers to make way for new men. Then Gabe paused. He looked up the valley, but could not see his home for the dense smoke that was blowing over the summit. He was jostled aside by the new-comers, who came to the work like a company charging a battery. Gabe felt that he would not be needed now. He could no longer restrain his heart. He called on him louder, more urgently than it had done when there was time for him to get to his house before the conflagration had reached it, and he obeyed.

In the tumult he was not missed, and no one heard the clatter of his horse's hoofs over the stony road. Bending low over the pommel of his saddle he dashed into the smoke. He could not see, but he trusted his horse, now mad with fright. Presently he said: "Thank God!"

The lessening of the heat on his cheek, then a breath of cool air, told him that which he had not observed—the wind had veered, and had carried the fire off in another direction, west of his house, and it was safe. He of his own accord. Then he dismounted and climbed the side of the mountain, where he soon found his family on a point of rocks.

"I saw it all," said his wife; "but I did not know it was you working there so steadily."