Our Washington Letter

From our regular correspondent.
Washington, Oct. 28, 1892.
There is no partisanship in the sympathy which every man and woman who feels for President Harrison, who is to-day at his old home for the purpose of burying the remains of the woman who for more than thirty-nine years was a loving and faithful wife to him, the companion who rejoiced in his triumphs and consoled with him in his defeats in the great battle of life. He has received it from every quarter of the world and from every class of people, since the death of Mrs. Harrison; cablegrams from the crowned heads of Europe and from the Pope of the mighty church of Rome, as well as telegrams from humbler individuals, at home and abroad, all bringing one message—sympathy for the man upon whom this great loss has fallen; it is stronger than political prejudice, as was demonstrated, when the democrats removed their campaign flag from Pennsylvania avenue until after the funeral of Mrs. Harrison had been held and her remains were removed from the city; it is stronger than the desire for social enjoyment, as shown by the numerous announcements of postponed or abandoned entertainments which were to have been held this week; it is in short, as strong as humanity itself, as pure as a maiden's virtue, as sweet as love, as noble as patriotism, and almost as holy as religion. The world is better for having shown this sympathy, and by and by when the poignancy of his grief shall have been softened by time, the greatest human comforter, Mr. Harrison will be better for having received it. It is a spectacle for the world that will not soon be forgotten to see a nation, irrespective of creed, class or politics, in tears over the grave of a woman. If "an honest man is the noblest work of God," surely a good woman ranks next in Divine nobility.

Mrs. Harrison's funeral, at the White House, was as private as it could be made. The services were the very simple ones prescribed by the Presbyterian Church, and the attendance was limited to members of the Cabinet and their families and a few of the closest personal friends of the Harrison family. By special request of President Harrison the departments were not closed. The remains were accompanied to Indianapolis by all of the Cabinet, except Secretary Tracy, who was requested to remain here.

Mrs. Harrison's death brought politics in Washington, to an abrupt stop, but now that her remains have been taken away the pot has begun boiling again in a way that indicates very plainly the nearness of election day, and also to the eye of the trained observer the doubtfulness of the result. It is regarded as an amusing coincidence that Senator Hill, the morning after he had made a speech in New York, denouncing political turn-coats should have found himself eating breakfast in a Washington hotel at the same table with Mr. W. MacVeigh, of Pennsylvania, who is one of the most prominent turn-coats of the present campaign.

Senator Hill is in one respect like Senator Quay in his political methods—he seldom consents to talk for publication, except on the stump. While he was in Washington, on his way to Virginia to make speeches, the newspaper men tried every scheme imaginable to get something definite in the way of an opinion bearing on the result of the present campaign from him, but none of them succeeded. They also tried to find out why he jumped on MacVeigh in that New York speech, when other members of his party were lauding him to the skies for having declared for Cleveland, but all they got was: "I do not know Mr. MacVeigh at all."

Mr. Blaine returned with his family to Washington this week, and from the number of prominent callers he has had since he got home it would seem that those who announced that he was out of politics when he resigned from it were mistaken.
