THE "ROGUES' GALLERY."

Here they are, Sir, if you please, portraits numbering four. Have a chair, Sir? Take your time; sit down.

Yes, only little rogues, Sir; but I would have you know they are the best of their kind.

The Beautiful Gypsy and her Ring. Some time in the fifteenth century, when the monastery was in the height of its power and fame, and when high-born youths came from far and near to receive instruction from the learned monks, there was staying at the abbey for this purpose a young man of good family called Hans von Wessenberg.

There happened to be among the gypsies a maiden of unusual and peerless beauty, the pride and delight of the tribe, a creature with soft dark eyes, whose long, dark hair fell down to her feet, and softly tinted cheeks, such as Correggio only could have put on canvas.

Still he did not turn and fly, as perhaps he should, with this impression, have done. Later on, however, he discovers that the beautiful vision was no deluding water-sprite, but a true maiden of flesh and blood, and he felt less inclined to turn and fly than before.

It is like a lock of his golden hair, she thinks, twisted about her finger, and she loves to play with it, child as she is, as though it were.

"How pretty they all are! how pretty they must look on me!" she cries, in innocent vanity, not knowing that it was she who gave a beauty to the trickiest fry more than they gave to her.

With a cry of despair the girl leaps from the rock to meet her lover, and to pour into his ear the sad news.

at the raven's nest overhanging the edge of the rock far above her head, where the bird has retired with his prey.

"What that he so," said the young lover, smiling, yet moved by the anguish of her face, "you shall very soon have it back again—both the ring and the happiness."

But the young man, excited now with the sense of an exploit, almost achieved, sends back a reassuring shout, and pursues his perilous way upward.

But the gipsy carried the body of the young man to the abbey, where he was buried, and removing their camp from the neighborhood, took the unfortunate Elsa with them.

The pin machine is one of the closest approaches that mechanics have made to the dexterity of the human hand.

When the elder Booth was residing in Baltimore, a pious, urbane old gentleman of that city, bearing of his wonderful power of calculation, one day invited him to dinner, although always depreciating the stage and all theatrical performances.

It may be said that drunkenness at elections is caused in a great measure by party spirit.

—A great deal of what is called hypocrisy arises from the delicacy one has of offending the feelings of another.

November in History.

The anniversaries of November are quite in keeping with its somber reputation, being mostly of a very gloomy order.

On the 1st of November, 1755, occurred the great earthquake of Lisbon, the most terrible which has ever devastated Europe.

On the 20th Admiral Vernon and his famous "six ships" captured Porto Bello, on the Panama Isthmus. The 23d, 24th, and 25th witnessed the series of battles by which Gen. Grant drove Bragg from Chattanooga.

—A Dutchman being asked how often he shaved, replied, "Dree times a week, effery tay but Saantay; den I shaves effery tay."

"The other night about 10 o'clock a constable who was walking up a street in Detroit on business he was halted by a weak looking little man who was a bit agitated.

"It is my humble opinion that there is no family in here and that a water-pipe has bursted. I dislike very much to see any one's property damaged if I can prevent it."

"I'm sure enough, there were two feet of water in the cellar and more rushing in."

HE ACKNOWLEDGED THE CORN.—It has always been thought that ears of corn have an even number of rows, and that one with an odd number of rows would be and impossibility.
