TOYS OF THE POOR.

An Easy and Cheap Way by Which You May Be Amused.

I am going to show you an innocent pleasure. There are so few amusements that are not criminal or sinful!

When you leave the house in the morning with the fixed intention of loafing in the streets, fill your pockets with cheap toys—a jumping jack, a monkey on a stick, the athletic skeleton, a blacksmith hammering, a cat beating a drum, a horse whose tail is a whistle—and give them to the children playing in the gutter or watching a procession or a hand organ or tending a baby. Their eyes will start out of their heads. At first they will not dare to take them; they will be suspicious; then their hands will grab the gift, and they will run away like unto cats who wish to eat afar off the piece you gave them, for they have learned to beware of men.

Behind the grated gate of a large garden at the end of which appeared the whiteness of a country house splendid in the sun, a handsome child was standing, dressed with coquettish simplicity.

Luxury, freedom from care, the habitual sight of wealth, give such beauty to these children that you would believe them to be made of other dough than that which forms the children of moderate circumstances or poverty.

By his side on the grass was a costly plaything as spick and span as its owner, varnished, gilded, clothed in a purple robe, covered with plumes and glass beads. But the child paid no attention to his favorite plaything. This is what he was looking at:

On the other side of the gate in the road among thistles and nettles there was another child, dirty, pitiful, face smooched with soot, a pariah brat. An impartial eye would discover his beauty if, as the eye of a connoisseur divines an ideal picture under a coating of coach varnish, he should clean it of the disgusting oxidation of extreme poverty.

Though the symbolical barrier separating two worlds, the open road and the country house, the poor child showed to the rich child his own plaything, which the latter examined greedily as a rare and unknown thing. Now, this toy, which the dirty urchin teased, shook about and poked at in a wired box, was a live rat. The parents, through economy no doubt, had taken this plaything from life itself.

And the two children laughed in brotherly fashion, and their teeth were of an equal whiteness.—Boston Journal.

FUN WITH "DUTCH TEARS."

A Little Experiment of Interest Which Almost Any One Can Perform.

"It is a great wonder to me," said an old chemist in his laboratory the other day, "why more boys do not take up chemical experiments as an amusement. Why, I can do things with the common materials of everyday life which really seem to be more magical to the uninitiated than any of the wonders performed by magicians on the public stage.

"Now, there are those curious little bubbles of glass known variously as 'Prince Rupert's drops' and as 'Dutch tears.' Apparently they are merely little globules of glass with elongated tails, made by heating a small glass rod in a flame and allowing the molten drops to fall into water. After they have cooled you may pound the thick part with a hammer or mallet, yet you cannot break them. On the other hand, if you break a little piece off their tails or touch any part of them with a quartz crystal, they will disappear into the surrounding atmosphere quicker than snow will melt on a hot fire. To the person who does not know the reason the performance is most astonishing.

"And yet it is all very simple. It is due to what is known as surface cohesion. Glass when heated to a molten state has naturally reached a very high temperature, and when the drops of melted glass are allowed to fall into the cold water the sudden change produces stress all over the surface of the drop which is really terrific.

This stress, however, must be considered as a whole. It is very strong when taken all together, but it is exactly as though a piece of very thin rubber was stretched over the surface of the glass. If you punctured the rubber, its haste to resume its normal condition would pull it off the glass.

"So when you break off the tail of the drop or cut through the film of very hard glass with a crystal its endeavor suddenly to resume its normal condition results in its own destruction, and it breaks up into particles which are really finer than the finest sand. It seems like a wonderful performance, but it is no more wonderful than many another which any youngster could perform if he would study even the simplest forms of chemical action."—New York Sun.

Tough.

Customer—If you ever send me another piece of meat like the last one, I'll take away my custom.

Butcher—What's the matter with it?

Customer—Why, it was so tough that when it was cooked I couldn't get my fork even into the gravy.—London Tit-Bits.

LIED TO SAVE HIM.

HOW GEORGE SAND KEPT HER OLD TUTOR FROM PRISON.

The Story of a Highly Dramatic Incident In the Girlhood Life of This Remarkable Frenchwoman—A Vow Which Was Not Exacted by the Law.

With the possible exception of George Eliot few women writers have been the subject of so much outspoken abuse as fell to the lot of George Sand. In a defense of this remarkable Frenchwoman a writer in the Springfield Republican tells the following story as an argument to show her innate nobility and goodness:

After the death of her paternal grandmother at the old family residence in Nohant, Aurore Dupin, now 17 years of age, accompanied by her mother, her Aunt Lucy and her beloved old tutor, went to a notary in Paris to have the property of the deceased, to which she and her half brother, Hyacinth, were the sole heirs, adjusted according to law.

This old tutor had been the instructor of her father, now long dead, and of her half brother, as well as the only teacher of herself, and to him she owed, she says, all of the efficient mental training she had ever received. She had studied Latin with him, and he had been her guide in all the reading of her young years.

A few years previous to the death of his patroness, by a sudden veering about of thought, not altogether unusual with the aged, though quite incomprehensible, and which would provoke our laughter if it did not compel our tears, this old scholar and dreamer conceived the idea that he would turn his attention to business and build up a fortune.

He besought Mme. Dupin to allow him the use of some portion of her lands, for which he should pay a certain rent, and as she never denied anything to the old instructor of her grandchildren and friend of her own declining years she consented. The bargain was closed. All went on well apparently for some time, he paying the rents stipulated as they fell due.

At the time of her grandmother's death Aurore Dupin knew nothing whatever of this transaction, but upon the day of the settlement of the estate when the notary came to that part of the business and began to interrogate the tutor as to the rentals still uncanceled this young girl, observing the embarrassment of her old friend and recalling some forgotten incidents of the past which seemed now to have hinged upon the revenues of these leased lands, saw plainly that there was something hidden behind his confusion and utter inability to give an account of the deficits, which would not stand the test of a thorough investigation.

She thought: "If my grandmother had desired that these moneys should be collected from him, would she not have told me so before her death? I am not poor enough nor mean enough to try to extort from him that which he cannot pay surely, else he would. I will not see that dear old head grow gray in prison." And she determined to save him from this dishonor by a bold, stoutly maintained lie.

To lie, that was dreadful! She had been at school in a convent for the last ten years under the guidance of a sisterhood of very pure and stern women. She was at this time enthusiastically religious. To lie! "All liars shall be turned into hell." But the question now was not of the safety of herself, but of another.

So, rising and approaching the lawyer, she said hurriedly, but steadily: "I have had these revenues. They have been paid to me." "And where are they, child?" the notary questioned, hard pressed by professional obligation to be quite impartial and dispassionate. "I have spent them," she replied, no whit daunted.

"She lies! She lies!" cried out Mme. Dupin, the mother of Aurore, a self willed, hysterical woman, sprung from the lower orders, of whose uncontrollable temper her daughter had always been the victim. "She shall declare it upon her honor," knowing better than any other that honor was a very compelling word with the Dupins.

"Are you willing, Aurore," asked gentle Aunt Lucy, "to affirm upon your honor that you speak the truth?"

The proud old Dupin blood surged hot and strong in the girl's veins. Honor! Should she, a soldier's child, lie away her honor? But she said without a moment's hesitation, "Yes, I am willing to aver it upon my honor."

"She lies! She lies!" again shrieked out her mother. "She shall go to the church and swear it upon the Bible, upon the Christ," knowing as well how sacred her Saviour's name was to that young soul yearning for the beauty of holiness almost shut out from her by the example and by the awful inheritance of evil tendency she had derived from her.

How deep and wide (remember this girl was only 17 years old) must have yawned the lake of fire and brimstone just before those young, intrepid feet! She cleared it at a bound and rose from the wings of the sublimest lie a woman ever uttered to the heights of eternal truth that towered above it bathed in the light of God. She says, "I thought God was on my side," and, willing to be damned for love's sake, if thus it should eventuate, said solemnly, "I will swear it upon the Christ."

The room was as still as death as the notary, awed by that holy crime, said almost tenderly, "It is not necessary, Aurore; it shall not be exacted."

As the party passed from the courtroom the humble tutor, saved by his pupil's offense from paying the penalty of the only infamous act he had ever committed, said in a low, broken voice, "I will pay you, Aurore, every penny." "Of course you will," she replied, knowing that his power of making restitution was as small as his desire to do so was great.

A Willing Librarian.

There is really nothing in the world more pleasant than a cheerful willingness to oblige on the part of a public servant. I wish especially to commend a young clerk up at the new library for the thoroughness with which he attends to his duties. One of my friends went up to the library the other day and asked for "Buttertlies, a Tale of Nature," by James Lane Allen. The regular routine was gone through with. My friend took a seat at a reading table. Presently a clerk approached her. "I couldn't get just the book you wanted," he said politely, "but here is something on the same subject." And he handed her a treatise on lepidoptera, in two volumes, by a scientist with half the alphabet after his name.—Washington Post.

Willing Enough.

Two men took their seats in the theater.

"Put your hat under the seat," said one to the other.

An old woman sitting directly in front quickly removed her huge hat and, turning apologetically, said:

"I can't get it under the seat."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The Maelstrom.

A recent writer says regarding the celebrated maelstrom that the inhabitants of the Lofodens are not in the least afraid of it, but fish right in the middle of the whirlpool.

Every American man-of-war has in her outfit flags of 48 nations, which are used on occasions of visits to the ports of those countries and in exchanging salutes of vessels belonging to them.
