As soon as we got well under way the gale became menacing. The other four steamers came plowing along in our wake, crowded to the guards with passengers and bands of music playing. The Chipewa towed the big schooner to the landing on the Canadian side of the Niagara river, where our passengers went ashore, as did those of the William Penn. The passengers of the Henry Clay and Pioneer landed on the American side of the river. There were three miles above the falls, and the crowds of people were taken from there on the river in wagons of all kinds.

The high grounds on both shores of the river were lined with people as the ship approached, and a great number approached, beat on the first rapid of the seething descent, apparently keeping the very course that a skilful navigator would have guided her in. The American side was flanked by her bow and the British ship followed her stern. The vessel shot the first rapid unharmed, still leading on, making a plunge, shipping a sea and rising from it in her usual way.

The Enterprise was not more than 12 miles away, in the southwest. The yawl had just gone off in the night out: "Deck ahoy! There goes a gun right northeast off the starboard bow." In the distance, the light of a searchlight. One of the officers spring into the rigging with a night glass and hailed: "There it goes again! I hear the boom!"

The effect was tremendous. A chorus of wild cries arose from the deck, and down came her foremast and mainmast. "Give it to 'em again," and her decks were clear. "Back her mainsail," in a minute the descending masts were up again, and the schooner was sweeping up to board her deck, alive with men.
