Drawbaugh House
Western Run Rd. near
Western Rd, Cockeyville
Not accessible
Circa 1800

The original section of this house represents the basic earliest type of home built on newly owned land. While archival research does not reveal a specific date, the architecture is virtually the same as that of the late eighteenth century and its substantial stone construction has allowed it to remain with few alterations and additions virtually the same as when built. The small "Vinegar House" suggests that early owners may have considered vinegar their cash crop.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Drawbaugh House is a two storey house of stone and frame construction, built in three sections:

A stone section, originally of one and one-half storeys, probably raised to its present two storeys when the second section was built, approximately 17 feet by 21 feet, two bays, facing south and now considered the rear (west) wing, probably early nineteenth century

A stone section, two bays, facing east, slightly taller than the first section, probably dating from the third quarter of the nineteenth century

A frame section also facing east, a continuation of the second section, three bays, probably dating from the very end of the nineteenth century or very early in the twentieth

The outline of the original one and one-half storey profile of the west wing is visible externally on the west wall and internally on the east. Small attic windows flanked the stone chimney in the west end. A door occupies the east bay of the south front, a 6/6 window occupies the west bay; a single 6/6 window is centered in the north facade and large rough stone lintels support the masonry above. A former oven opening has been filled with stone behind the large first storey fireplace. The walls were raised to allow a full second storey when the second section was built, a fact indicated by the absence of cornice evidence on the projecting structural members of the second section within the attic of the (raised) first. Two windows, each 4/2, are in the second storey's north and south walls, and a one storey shed-roofed porch extends across the south front of this section. The new roof rafters appear to be the originals, reused with collar-beam mortises abandoned.

Internally, this section is a single room on each floor. The first storey ceiling has never been plastered; joists are new. The large fireplace in the west end is fitted with a crane for cooking and it is flanked by cupboards, each with a single upper and lower door with flush panels; the doors are hung on cast-iron hinges made by Baldwin, dating from the early nineteenth century. Original flooring nails appear to be cut. An opening is framed for a stairwell along the east wall in the southeast corner, but the present stair to the second floor is enclosed along the north wall in the northeast corner. In the cellar, accessible through a door under the south porch, the log joists and flooring above are whitewashed. The fireplace hearth above is supported on several log lintels.

The second section has two windows in each storey facing east, and one facing south, slightly west of center. The first storey northerly window in the east front was a door. Windows are 6/9, and the masonry above is supported by a brick jack-arch. The single-flue chimney rising from the south gable served stoves, not fireplaces.

Internally, this section is a single room on each floor; trim is plain beaded material and the log roof rafters are mitered at the ridge. First floor joists are also of log; the original crawl space has been deepened into the cellar with concrete block walls.

The dwelling's principal entrance is through the southerly bay of the frame section's east front; it is sheltered by a small portico of twentieth century construction, its arched tympanum recalling the Palladian motif. Walls are covered with weather-boarding; windows are 6/6 and a single flue chimney rises through the north gable end.

Within, a narrow hall with a straight staircase extends through the southerly bay. The routed and chamfered newel of maple is finished with a large ball finial. A single room occupies the two northerly bays. Roof rafters are of straight-sawn material, mitered at the ridge; first floor joists are of straight-sawn material, and the original crawl space, like the second section, has been deepened into a cellar with concrete block walls.

A two storey structure approximately 12 feet square, built into the hillside southwest of the original section of this house, is known as the Vinegar House, probably indicating its original, or early, function. The ground storey of stone is accessible from the east side; the framed second storey is accessible from the west.
