The New Munster Stone was set in place in 1792 to replace the earlier poplar tree which was used in the beginning reference for the New Munster Tract that was granted to Edmund O'Dwyer in 1683. The following excerpt was taken from Maryland's Rent Rolls,

" all that tract of parcell of land called New Munster lyeing in Cecill County on the maine fresh of Elk Râver and on both sides of the said fresh beginning at a marked poplar on a high bank on the west side of the maine fresh and about a pistole shott to the northward of the mouth of a rivulet called the Shure..." (NS B/201)

The granting of this large tract to a non-resident and other Irishmen appears to have been a strategic move by Lord Calvert to protect unsettled and disputed lands from Penn's settlers moving south.

New Munster Stone Description

The New Munster Stone was set in place in 1792 to replace an earlier poplar tree that was used as the beginning reference for the New Munster Tract that was granted in 1683 to Edmund O'Dwyer. The stone is located on the steep west bank of the Big Elk Creek and two hundred yards north of what is presently called Gramies Run.

The boundary marker consists of two granite slabs set together with a roughly shaped pointed head and worn vertical surfaces. Inscriptions are found on each side; some more legible than others. The north side, which faces the area known as New Munster, has the capital initials N M for "New Munster." Directly below are the capital letters N I for "New Ireland." The east side has the capital letter B for "Beginning." The south side of the marker is not as smooth but the capital letters W S are most distinct at the base of the exposed stone. They stand for Wallace's Scrawl which was attract to the south of New Munster that was granted in 1737. It was inherited by Matthew Wallace in 1792 and question concerning the exact boundary arose. The once healthy poplar tree had deteriorated and a new marker was needed. A boundary commission was formed and the stone set to establish the new beginning point. The most illegible markings are those of the west side. Faint outlines can be seen of the original survey date of 1683.

The stone has undoubtedly settled through the years and ^{is} not protruding as high as it may have at one time. It seems probable that for more accurate surveys the stone would have been standing higher and therefore closer to a surveyor's transit.

Statement of Significance

The New Munster Stone is the last boundary marker in situ for the extensive 6000 acre New Munster Tract that was granted to Edmond O'Dwyer and other Irishmen in 1683 and laid out by George Talbot, then Surveyor General of Maryland. The following excerpt is found in Maryland Rent Rolls at the Hall of Records.

"all that tract or parcell of land called New Munster lyeing in Cecill County on the maine fresh of Elk River and on both sides of the said fresh beginning at a marked poplar on a high bank on the west side of the maine fresh and about a pistole shott to the northward of the mouth of a rivlet called the Shure..." (NS B/201)

The granting of this large tract of land to a non-resident and other Irishmen appears to have been a strategic move by Lord Calvert to protect his original grant from encroachments by William Penn. Mentioned in George Talbot's survey were, "tenures granted to the 'takers up' of the land should be at their election, 'leasees for one and thirty years' or firm grants to them and their heirs forever."² Other non-residents owned the property after Edmond O'Dwyer and it was not until 1714 that Thomas Stevenson of Bucks County, Pa. sold approximately 1150 acres to a company of men including Matthew Wallace, yeoman, James Alexander, farmer, Arthur Alexander, farmer, and David Alexander, tanner.³ This transfer of land in 1714 was exactly thirty-one years after the original grant in 1683. The conveyance mentions that Matthew Wallace and co. had, "for some years last past improved and possessed said tract and divided same among themselves..."⁴ It seems very probable that this company of men were the original Scotch-Irish settlers that occupied and protected the New Munster tract and then offered the property after the original thirty-one year lease expired.

These facts substantiate the premise that the New Munster Tract was a significant Scotch-Irish settlement in the 17th century and according to Henry Jones Ford's work, The Scotch Irish in America, "the earliest definitely recorded."⁵ The Scotch-Irish had proved to be sturdy and reliable settlers in other Maryland buffer zones, and thus the logical people to occupy contested territory between Maryland and Pennsylvania.

The early lot ownership has been partially defined on a modern U.S.G.S. map by Lon W. Lincoln, a researcher from Georgia in 1959. He acquired deeds dating back to 1718 and assembled names with their specific lot boundaries. (SEE MAP)

As mentioned in the description the present stone did not play in the early boundary surveys but was set in place in 1792 when the original poplar tree had deteriorated. A boundary commission was formed to reestablish the boundary of the New Munster Tract and to define its relation to Matthew Wallace's recently inherited Wallace's Scrawl directly south.

"William Kilgore aged about 55 years deposeseth and saith that the place now shewn to the commissioners is the place where stood a poplar tree which tree being now gone at which place a stone is set marked N M on north side W S on south side..." (JB 1/399-403)⁶

The stone has naturally remained as a fixed point for subsequent surveys of nearby property. Twelve acres was sold to Jacob Markey by Jethro and Elizabeth McCullough in 1852 (HHM 1/9) and reference to the stone appears in the boundary description,

"... beginning for the same at a large stone set in the ground on the west bank of Big Elk Creek being the beginning of a large tract of land called "New Munster..."

The stone is presently located in the midst of a 40 to 50 year old hardwood forest and owned by Elizabeth E. Booth.
