C. 3rd to 4th Quarters of the 18th Century —
Early 19th Century

A recent sheathing of hand split shingles will further preserve this 1½ story 18th century heavy timber frame house along Perch Creek near the old Frenchtown and New Castle Rail Road bed. The architectural history and development of this house is not completely clear but what is apparent is that the house saw major plan rearrangement in the early 19th century. The house appears to have been changed from a hall/parlor plan to a side hall/parlor plan. A early 19th century stair exists against the west gable end wall and over a corner fireplace support which is no longer operative. A diagonal patch in the same corner of the second floor documents the chimney's earlier rise through the house. The present stair hall appears to have been the parlor and present parlor ^{an} earlier hall ^{that has lost its} ~~without~~ box winder stair. A patch exists in the opposite corner of the parlor where the original stair probably rose. The second floor remains basically untouched with its featheredged vertical board wall partitions and four panel doors with wrought latches. The heavy timber framing is exposed on the second floor and is decorated with a corner bead. The attic is accessible through a trap door and a common rafter roof frame is evident.
