The Rider House, 326 E. Broadway, faces south on a street of bungalows and 4-squares built in Ingleside in the 1920s. The 3 bay bungalow has shingle (now painted white) over clapboard siding, shed-roofed dormers (south and north) with triple 3/1 windows, and paired 3/1 double-hung sash windows lighting the living room and dining room and the gable ends (east and west).

The early 1920s saw three new additions to the Town of Bel Air: Fulford Park (1922), Ingleside (1923), and Kenmore (1924). In each case the lots were sold at auction. Ingleside was subdivided by J. Edwin Webster and named for his home to the north. This bungalow was probably built between 1923 and 1929 by William Rider. It is a compact and well-developed example of the style as built in Bel Air between the world wars.

Contributing resource count: one

The Rider House, 326 E. Broadway, faces south on a street of bungalows and 4-squares built in the 1920s. The 3 bay bungalow has shingle (now painted white) over clapboard siding. The shed-roofed dormers (south and north) with triple 3/1 windows, the paired 3/1 double-hung sash windows lighting the living room and dining room and the gable ends (east and west), and the interior use of space mark this house as typical of the style as built in Bel Air.

Also typical of the style, but unusual in Bel Air, are the 4 square tapered posts on rock-faced concrete block piles which support the front porch.

The entry in the middle bay of the facade (south) leads directly to the living room, which occupies the whole front of the house. The 3 panel door with 3 long panes is original. The east wall of the living room is oddly on the diagonal, for which no structural reason can be found. The wide doorless opening to the dining room (to the north) still has the original rod for the curtain that once separated the rooms. East of the dining room is the kitchen, with pantry. An open string dog-leg staircase with no brackets and square post and balustrade runs along the east wall of the living room to an upstairs hall with a continuation of the balustrade. Three bedrooms and bath are upstairs.

Another typical touch: hardwood floors downstairs are oak; upstairs they are pine.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The early 1920s saw three new additions to the Town of Bel Air: Fulford Park (1922), Ingleside (1923), and Kenmore (1924). In each case the lots were sold at auction. Ingleside was subdivided by J. Edwin Webster and named for his home to the north. This bungalow was probably built between 1923 and 1929 by William Rider. It is a compact and well-developed example of the style as built in Bel Air between the world wars. The Rineharts bought the property in 1946 to raise their four children, and three of the children still live in the neighborhood. Dorothy Basl, the current owner, is the only daughter. Carroll Rinehart now lives across the back fence at 325 Webster St. [HA-i806], and James lives just down the block on the other side of East Broadway at the corner of McCormick St.

Very few changes have taken place here. The Basls extended the odd diagonal east wall of the living room to put in a coat closet. This took out the second stair balustrade upstairs. They also renovated the kitchen, which did away with a door in the north wall and opened up the space to the pantry.
