Site of Marlboro "Colored" School
Valley Lane (north side), Upper Marlboro, Md.
Priv/Unocc/ - /Unexposed

The Marlboro "Colored" Elementary School stood on this site from its construction in 1877 until its demolition in 1982. It was a one-story frame gable-roofed structure, with entrance through the south gable end. Four windows on each side lighted the single room which constituted the larger north section of the building.

The history of the Marlboro "Colored" School is closely associated with that of Union Chapel. Members of the church formed the Colored Free School Society in 1866, and with the Freedmen's Bureau overseeing construction, the first schoolhouse was completed and opened in April 1868. It is not certain what happened to this schoolhouse, but it was replaced within ten years; the second schoolhouse was built on the subject property in 1877, and it was this Marlboro "Colored" Elementary School which operated for over a half-century. In 1935, it was sold as a private residence, and it remained so until the summer of 1982. At this time, it was replaced through block grant funding by a prefabricated house, and the school building was razed. It's site, however, is important in the history of Black education in Prince George's County.

The Marlboro Colored Elementary School stood on this site from its construction ca. 1877 until it was demolished in the summer of 1982. It was a one-story frame gable-roofed structure, with entrance through the south gable end, typical of the post Civil War schools built for black students. Four windows on each side lighted the single room which constituted the larger north section of the building; a small room on the south (probably added later) formed the entryway, and was lighted by one window on each side.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

Soon after the Civil War ended, a Methodist Church for the Black community of Upper Marlboro was built on the southwest edge of the town. Within a year, this community had formed the Colored Free School Society, with the three original trustees of the church as its officers, and began to raise money to pay for the establishment of a school. Through 1866 and 1867 the Society negotiated with the "Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of the Colored People", which was to supply lumber for the building; and letters were written back and forth to the Freedmen's Bureau, which oversaw the building of the schools. (1)

The first school house was built on part of the church property, was finished by March 1868, and opened on the 1st of April 1868 with a White teacher, a Mr. J. A. Johnson from Philadelphia; provided by the Freedmen's Bureau. (2)

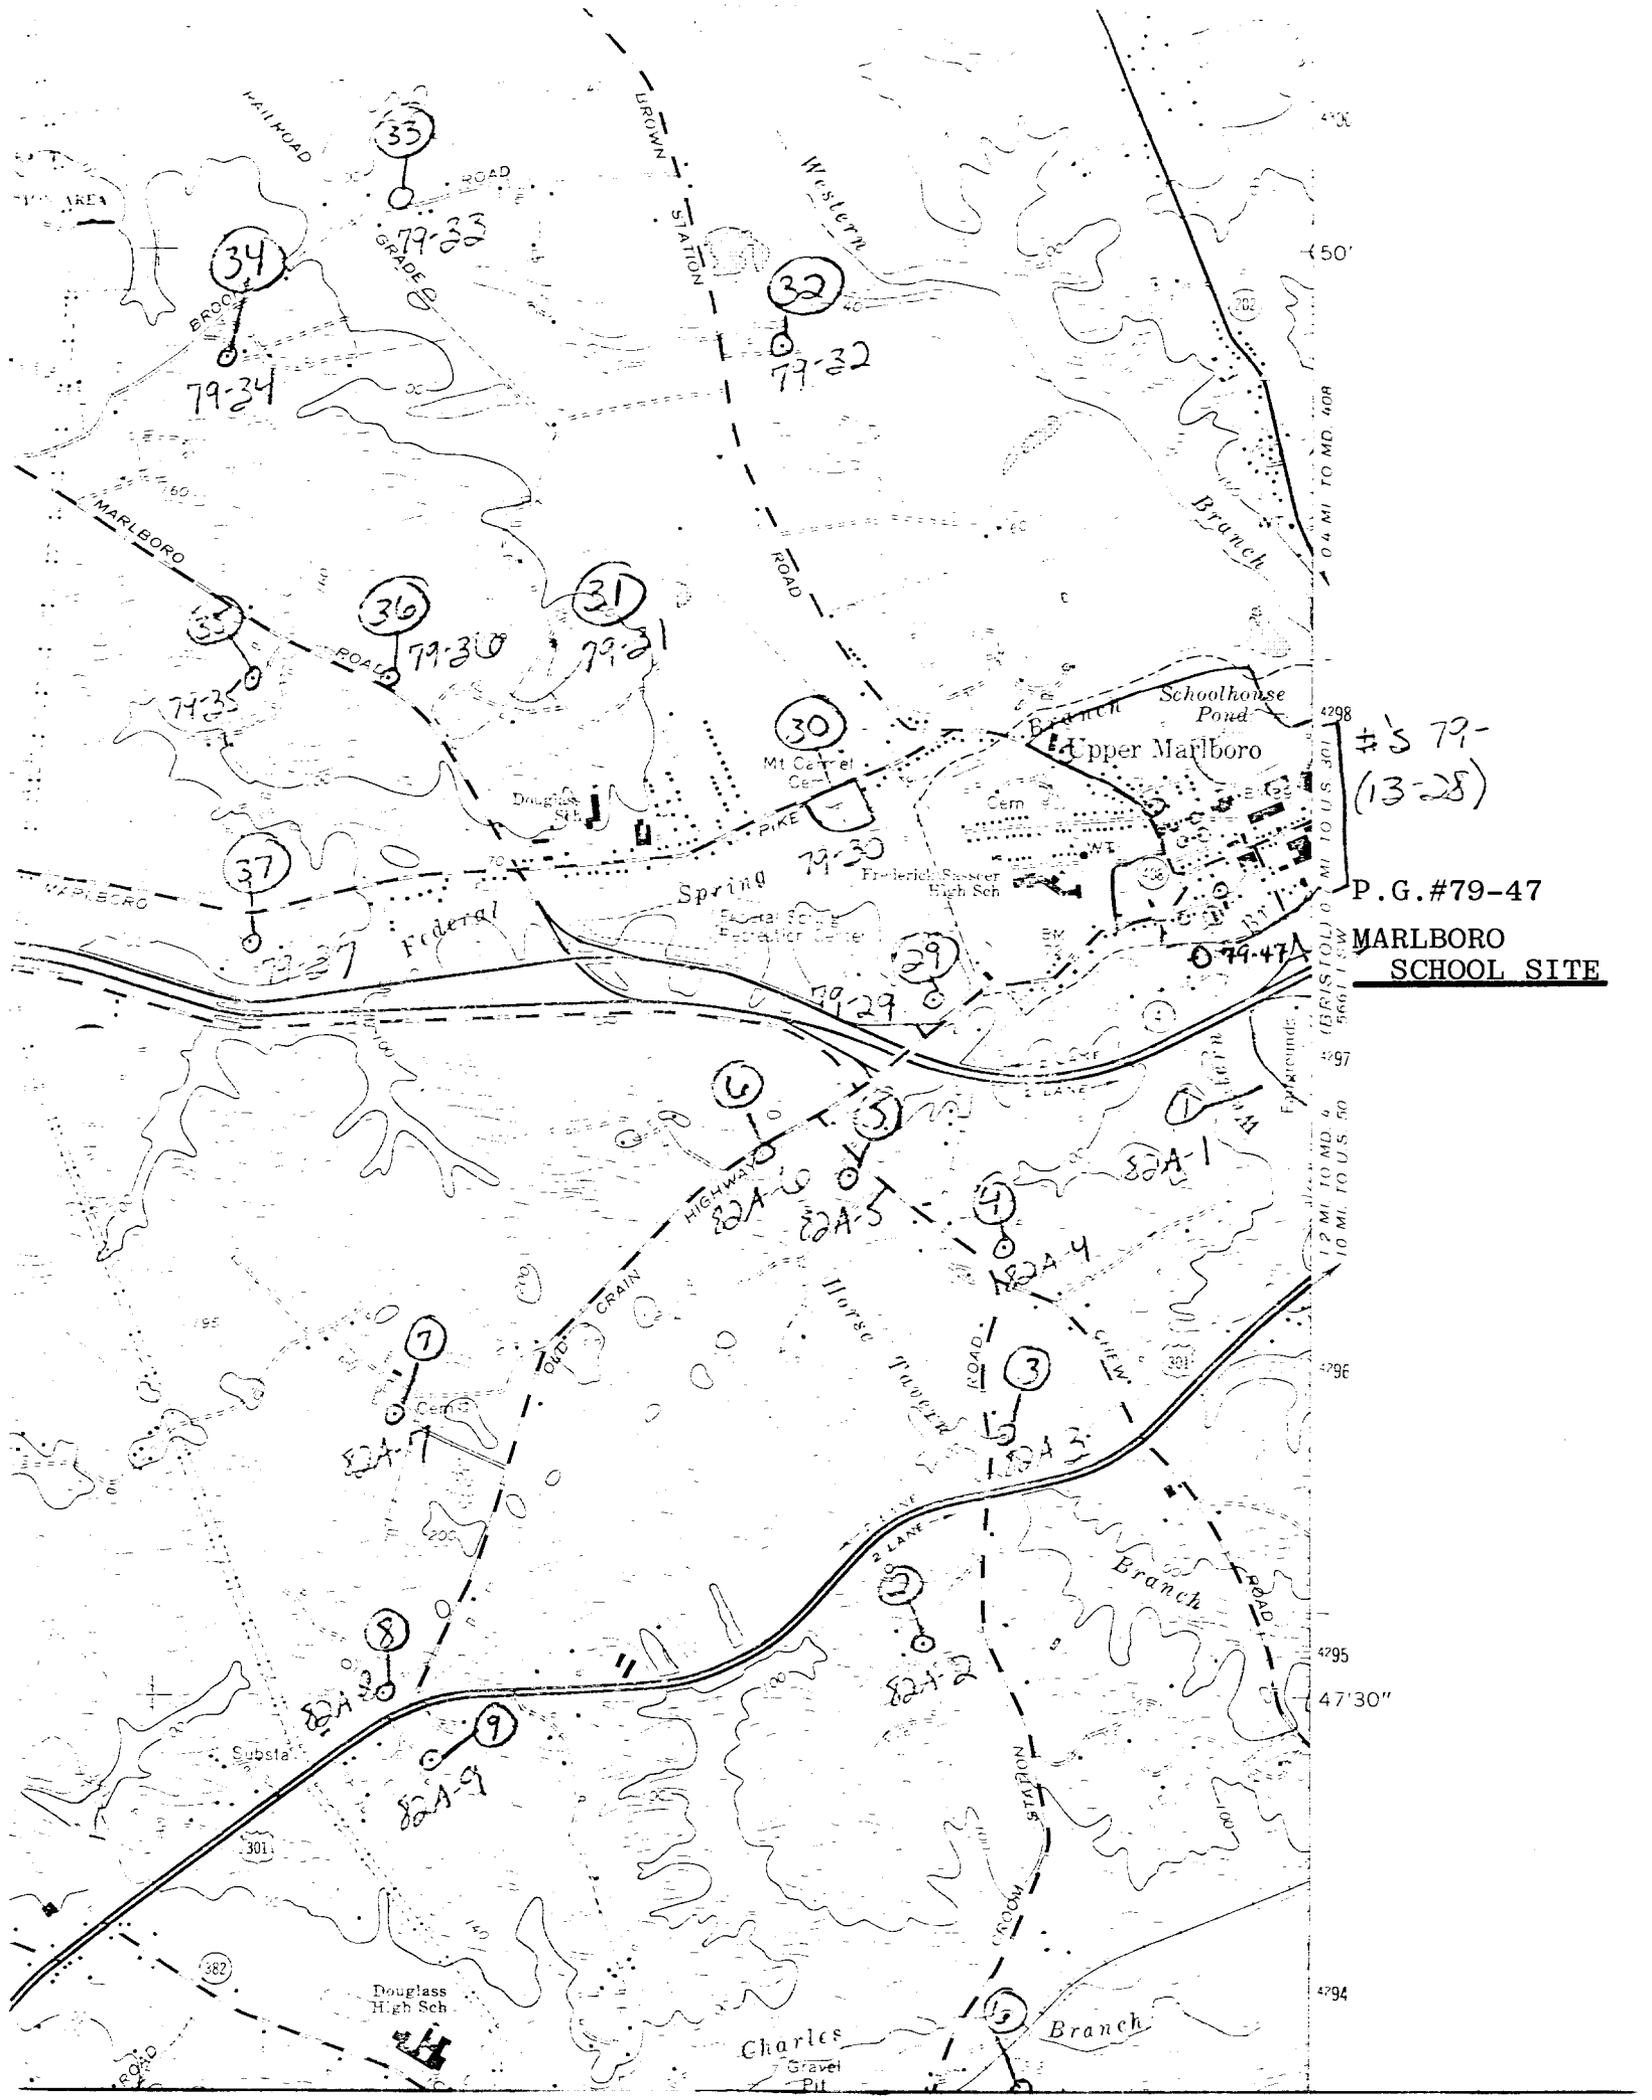

It is uncertain what happened to this first school, but in 1877 Frederick Sasscer, the same prominent Marlboro resident who had deeded land to the "Colored" Methodist Church 12 years earlier, deeded one more acre adjoining the church property on the northwest to the Board of School Commissioners of P.G. County in October 1877. (3) Richard B. B. Chew, a member of the Board, was authorized to arrange for the building of the schoolhouse, and by the end of the year, Cook was paid $297.56 for its construction. This was the building which came to be known as the Marlboro Colored Elementary School. (R.B.B. Chew was reimbursed by the Board for furnishing the school and for erecting two small outbuildings). (4)

The elementary school operated for over a half-century. In 1921, when a new high school was built for the white students of Marlboro, the old white high school (a four-room frame structure) was moved onto the colored elementary school lot to be used as a high school for blacks. This served as such until the mid-1930's, when Frederick Douglass

(Cont'd)

High School was built (for Black students) just south of the Courthouse in Upper Marlboro. At that time (1935) the high school was removed and the old elementary school was sold by the Board of Education as a private residence; it remained so until the summer of 1982. Because of its deteriorated condition, black grant funding provided for its replacement: a small prefabricated home was built next to the old school, and as soon as it was habitable, the old school was destroyed. Its site, however, is important in the history of Black education in P.G. County.
