

PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY
HISTORIC SITE SUMMARY SHEET

Survey #: ~~P.G. #79-29~~ Building Date: 1740's, ca. 1800, 1900

Building Name: Overseer's House

Location: 5611 Old Crain Highway, Upper Marlboro

Private/Residence/Unoccupied/Fair-Poor/Inaccessible

Description

The Overseer's House is a modest frame vernacular dwelling of the mid-eighteenth century, expanded ca. 1800 and enlarged again by a late Victorian extension. It consists of a one-and-one-half story two-part main block, to which has been added a one-story two-room extension. The first stage was the southmost, a one-room structure with loft space above, constructed ca. 1750. Originally this small dwelling had an exterior brick chimney with weatherings at its south gable end. There is an entrance in each of the east and west elevations, and a small boxed dog-leg staircase in the northwest corner. This earliest section was of post-and-girt construction, with diagonal corner braces. The heavy hewn members are joined by lapped joints pegged together. The structure is sheathed with riven board, applied flush to the framing, to which has been applied brick-pattern asphalt shingle. The projecting boxed cornice is composed of wide boards. Interior structural members were totally exposed and coated with whitewash; these members were later covered with machine-cut lath and plaster. Early in the nineteenth century, the Overseer's House was expanded by the construction of a one-in-one-half story north addition. Around the turn of this century, the northerly one-story section was constructed, of balloon-frame construction, built of machine-sawn materials.

Significance

The Overseer's House is a unique surviving example of an early domestic farm outbuilding; the structure contains a number of outstanding construction details, including the projecting exterior cornice, and the exposed interior structural members. This structure has served as an overseer's dwelling, a slave quarter, and most recently a tenant farm house; it was built in the mid-eighteenth century by David Craufurd, merchant of Upper Marlboro, who lived in the house on adjoining Kingston. Three generations of Craufurds lived and farmed this land on the west side of Upper Marlboro; during their ownership the Overseer's House was enlarged by the addition of another room. The property including both Kingston and the Overseer's House was sold in 1859 to Frederick Sasscer and has remained in the possession of his descendants to the present day. The Overseer's House is a unique surviving example in Prince George's County of an early domestic farm outbuilding; it is in poor condition, and may be moved to a new location for the purpose of preservation.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Overseer's House is a modest frame vernacular dwelling of the mid-eighteenth century, expanded ca. 1800 and enlarged again by a late Victorian extension. It consists of a one-and-one-half story two-part main block, to which has been added a one-story two-room extension. It stands on high ground just west of the town of Upper Marlboro one-half mile west of Kingston, the home of the family which operated the farm on which it stands.

Construction details indicate that the present building was constructed in three stages; see floor plan. The first stage was the southmost (Section A), a one-and-one half story one-room structure with loft space above, constructed ca. 1750. Originally this small dwelling had an exterior brick chimney with weatherings at its south gable end. Today that brick chimney is gone, replaced (after a chimney fire in 1972) by an interior concrete-block stove chimney just west of the ridge at the south gable end. This southmost section is circa 19 by 15 feet, and two bays wide; it has an entrance in each of the east and west elevations. These doors, presently boarded up, are directly across from one another; to the south of each door is a 4/4 double hung sash window. Originally, there was a third window in the north gable end; this opening was subsequently lengthened to form a door into the later central section (B).

The original one-room section (A) has a small boxed staircase in the northwest corner. This two-run dog-leg staircase opens at the east end, winds around 90° and rises steeply westward along the north wall to the small bedroom above. It is enclosed by vertical beaded boards of varying width.

This earliest section was of post-and-girt construction, with diagonal corner braces. The heavy hewn members are joined by lapped joints pegged together. The structure is sheathed with riven board, applied flush to the framing, to which has been applied (in this century) brick-pattern asphalt shingle. Two of the most interesting features of this oldest section are the exterior cornice and the interior finish. The boxed cornice projects approximately six inches from the surface, is composed of very wide boards hung from the girt, and is a prominent and unusual decorative feature. The interior finishing of this section is probably unique in Prince George's County. The interior structural members were totally exposed and coated with whitewash; these members were later covered with machine-cut lath and plaster. Interior trim around doors and windows is of plain board.

Early in the nineteenth century, the Overseer's House was expanded by the construction of a one-in-one-half story, ca. 12 by 15 foot addition to the north (B). The original window in the north gable end became a door leading into the additional space, as did the loft window at the top of the stairs. An exterior brick chimney was built at the new north gable end, serving a five-foot fire place which warmed this additional parlor. The new section (B) had one window on the west, and a door and window on the east. The steeply-pitched roof was extended to cover this added space. Differences can be observed in the roof construction techniques between sections A and B: in the earlier section (A) rafters were joined by overlap connections, while in the later section (B) they are joined by mortise and slim tenon. All materials are hand-cut. It was probably at this time that the dormers were built into the extended roof planes; there are two gable dormers, symmetrically placed in each plane. The dormers are presently boarded up, but appear to enclose 6/6 double hung sash windows. (The complete roof of the first two sections, circa 31 feet long, is now covered with standing-seam metal painted red.) At the same time a one-story porch was built across the west facade. Porch rafters were keyed into the roof rafters at a shallower pitch, the board cornice was extended vertically to meet the new rafters, and was continued across at the eaves of the new addition (B). The porch roof is now covered with standing-seam metal, continuous from the roof and supported by plain square posts. A smaller one-story porch was built, possibly at the same time, on the east elevation, sheltering the two east doorways. Siding is slightly narrower than that of the older section. This section (B) rests on a brick foundation; the older section (A) may have had a brick foundation, but it is now essentially deteriorated and missing.

Interior trim in the second section is plain, similar to that of the older section, but unlike the older section, the structural members are covered by riven lath and hair plaster.

Around the turn of this century, the northerly one-story section (C) was constructed, adding two more small (11 by 15 foot) living spaces. It is of balloon-frame construction, built of machine-sawn materials. At the ridge at the north gable end is an interior stove chimney which warms the northmost room; the interior room has no direct heat, but would have received radiated heat from the large brick chimney, originally exterior, which it enclosed. There are two windows and one door in each of the west and east elevations; windows are 2/2 double hung sash, now boarded up, with plain board surrounds. The boxed cornice was continued across the eaves of this late Victorian addition on both elevations, and the roof, which has a shallower pitch than that of the first two sections, is covered with the same standing-seam metal. The Victorian addition rested on brick piers, later infilled to form a full brick foundation. There is no basement under any of the house.

The building stands on a high point of ground now covered with saplings and underbrush. At the foot of the hill to the west are the traces of an old farm lane which leads northwest from the old (now closed) road to Croom, past several tobacco barns and the ruins of two tenant houses. One of these structures is in ruinous condition to the extent that its structural members can be readily observed; it can be dated to the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century. It is of hall-and-parlor plan, post and girt construction with full brick nogging between the posts. All of these structures stand on the Bacon Hall tract, part of the larger land holdings (known as Kingston Park) of the Craufurd and later the Sasscer families.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The Overseer's House is a unique surviving example of an early domestic farm outbuilding; the structure contains a number of outstanding construction details, including the projecting exterior cornice, and the exposed interior structural members. Built in the 1740's, it has served as an overseer's dwelling, a slave quarter, and most recently a tenant farm house. This structure reflects a remarkable continuity, for during its nearly 250-year existence, the farmland on which it stands has been owned and worked by only two families.

The Overseer's House stands on a tract of land known as Bacon Hall, part of the land holdings in the early eighteenth century of merchant David Craufurd.¹ Craufurd lived in the earliest part of the house on adjoining Kingston Park. In the 1740's, he had the subject small dwelling built, probably to house the overseer/manager of his farm labor force. The dwelling was modest, originally one room with loft, ca. 20 by 15 feet, but it was distinguished by a handsome projecting cornice.²

David Craufurd II, son of the merchant, inherited his father's plantation in 1749. Like his father, the younger Craufurd was a merchant and was an active supplier of troops during the Revolutionary War. He also served as a Justice of the County Court, and as a Delegate to the General Assembly.³

In 1772, Craufurd had all of his Marlboro property resurveyed, and repatented as Kingston Park; his 700-acre plantation contained 166 acres of Bacon Hall on which the overseer's house stands.⁴

David Craufurd II died in 1801 and bequeathed Kingston to his son, Colonel David Craufurd (III).⁵ It was probably soon after this that the overseer's dwelling was enlarged by the addition of a room to the north. Colonel Craufurd owned considerable real estate, assessed at the highest value in the Marlboro area.⁶

After Colonel Craufurd's death in 1842, a commission was appointed to survey and divide his real estate among his heirs.⁷ In 1859, these heirs sold the property to Dr. Frederick Sasscer, and from that time until the present, both the Kingston dwelling and the farm on which the Overseer's House stands has remained in the possession of Dr. Sasscer's heirs.⁸ It is likely that during the nineteenth century the overseer's house was used as a slave quarter. After the Civil War, the exposed interior members were covered with lath and plaster, and the structure became a tenant farm dwelling.

Around the turn of this century, during the ownership of Editor Frederick Sasscer, son of the doctor, the latest addition was built on the north end of the overseer's house. It remained a tenant farm dwelling (as did the two other early buildings which were built as slave quarters on the property) until the late 1970's.

The Overseer's House is a unique surviving example in Prince George's County of an early domestic farm outbuilding. The closest comparison is the William Wells House (74B-16a) also dating from the eighteenth century. The Overseer's House is distinguished by its decorative projecting cornice, and the fact that the interior structural members were originally exposed. The Overseer's House is in poor condition, and may be moved to a new location for the purpose of preservation.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This is a one-and-one-half-story frame gable-roofed building with a steeply pitched roof, built in two sections; a one-story addition has built on the west. The two-bay eastmost section of the house has been dendrochronologically dated to the mid-eighteenth century, probably 1742 to 1752. It has several features unique in Prince George's County structures: riven lapped siding, and an original interior of exposed structural members coated with whitewash.¹ Early in the nineteenth century a one-and-one-half-story section one bay in width was added to the west gable end; this second section had an exterior brick chimney at its west gable end, now enclosed by the later (probably early twentieth century) one-story addition. (The interior chimney at the east gable end has been rebuilt since a fire destroyed it in 1972.) A shed-type porch covers the south (main) facade of the two earliest sections. There are two dormers on each slope of the roof.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This structure stands on a tract called Bacon Hall, patented to Ninian Beall in 1671.¹ After Beall's death in 1717, the tract eventually was sold in 1741 to David Craufurd,² and the eastmost (oldest) section of the building was built shortly afterwards. The adjoining central section was added early in the nineteenth century. The farm on which this simple structure stood passed to a third generation of the family, Col. David Craufurd, and after his death in 1841 was sold to Zadock Sasscer whose descendants own it today.³ During the early years of the Sasscer family's ownership, the structure came to be known as the manager's or overseer's house, a name it retains today. Negotiations are in process for relocation and restoration of the overseer's house, which is probably the oldest surviving frame structure in Prince George's County.

This is a one-and-one-half-story frame building with a steeply pitched gable roof. There are three irregular bays on the main (south) facade, with the door and one window in the eastmost room. An interior chimney rises at the east gable end; it has been rebuilt since a fire destroyed it in 1972. A shed type porch covers the south facade, above which are two dormer windows. The exterior chimney at the west gable end is now enclosed by a one-story addition to the west.

This structure has been known for many years as the overseer's house. It stands on a tract called Bacon Hall, patented to Ninian Beall in 1671. Beall rose to great prominence before the end of the seventeenth century, was the owner of vast land acreage, and died at Bacon Hall in 1717. It is possible that the eastern section of the house was built during Beall's lifetime, and perhaps even served at one time as his dwelling house. Non-destructive architectural investigation, however, has failed to substantiate this. The land passed to the David Craufurd family, another prominent Upper Marlboro family, and then, just after the Civil War, to Dr. Frederick Sasser. It remains in the hands of his descendants. During the nineteenth century, it served as the residence of the farm overseer. The house is now empty, awaiting more thorough architectural investigation which may be able to establish its extreme antiquity.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The house is a 1-1/2 story frame structure with a shed-type porch across the main (south) facade. The south facade has two gabled dormer windows and a boxed cornice, visible under the present porch roof; the main floor is three irregular bays, with the entrance and one window toward the east end. On the west end, the chimney is free-standing, but the base has been covered by an extension of the house to the west.

The house has been covered with asbestos brick siding. Through holes in this, parts of two angle braces and a stud are visible, as are some sheathing boards which appear to be shiplapped. Through the boxed cornice, the end of the girt is visible at about the midpoint of the east section. The tenant said the attic has been completely ceiled below the rafters. The east chimney is small and internal.

Several years ago, the house burned and much of the east end was destroyed.
