Old Deal Island Bank
Deal Island
private

c. 1912

The Old Deal Island Bank is one of three, rurally sited, early twentieth-century bank buildings remaining in Somerset County. The other two are located in Marion. The stretcher and common bond brick building has survived with its basic exterior features including the double-door front entrance, marble sills, and segmental arched window openings. The interior has been refitted for use as a machine shop. Prior to the building's new use, the structure had reached a serious stage of deterioration since the roof had collapsed.

Construction of this bank building is estimated to date to 1912, when Julia Anne Shores, et.al. sold this parcel of ground for $100 (SFD 60/51). The parcel was part of the estate of Levin L. Shores, who purchased eight and one-half acres from Amanda T. Rider in 1871 for $500. (LW 13/73). The Deal Island Bank remained in operation until the 1929 Stock Market failure, and six years later the property was included in a chancery settlement.

Deal Island Bank description

The Old Deal Island Bank stands on the east side of MD Route 363 (Deal Island Road) in the center of the community of Deal Island. The single-story brick bank faces west, and the new hip roof is oriented on an east/west axis.

Built about 1912, the two-bay by one-room stretcher and common bond brick building was originally covered by a flat roof hidden by a parapet front. During the past two years the old bank has been converted to a machine shop, and a shallow pitched hip roof of asphalt shingles was built atop the brick walls.

The west (main) elevation is two bays across with an arched double door entrance in the west bay. The heavily molded lower panels contrast with the glazed upper panels. A clouded glass transom fills the upper portion of the round arched entrance. A sandstone keystone interrupts a three-course round arch. Marble steps remain in place. The adjacent window opening is a paired single pane sash with a stone sill and a segmental arch. A sandstone keystone interrupts the window arch. The stretcher bond brick facade is highlighted by stringcourses above the door and window openings, and a scar from the former front cornice remains along the upper wall surface. The corners of the building are set back one brick from the front wall surface.

The south side elevation is a seven-course common bond wall defined by a pair of inset brick panels and corbelled brick cornices. Two segmental arched window openings pierce the south wall and are covered by iron bars. The north wall surface has a single window opening in the west bay, while the east bay is a plain brick wall. The east (back) side is a plain brick wall surface.

The interior has been stripped and reworked as a machine shop. The plaster walls have been removed, and the brick is now exposed. Fixed in the northeast corner is the old safe room with a vaulted ceiling. The safe was buried within the building during conversion. The old bank office was formerly located in the southeast corner.

Stretching across in front of the building is a diagonal pattern brick walk.

SIGNIFICANCE

The Old Deal Island Bank is one of three rurally sited early twentieth-century bank buildings remaining in Somerset County. The other two are located in Marion. The stretcher bond brick building has survived with its basic exterior features intact including the double door entrance, marble sills, and segmental arched window openings. The interior, however, has been gutted to suit the needs of a machine shop. Before this new use, the building was reaching a serious stage of deterioration since the roof had long ago caved in.

Construction of this building is estimated at 1912, when Julia Anne Shores, et al. sold this parcel of ground for $100 (SFD 60/51). The parcel on which the bank stands was part of the estate of Levin L. Shores, who purchased eight and one-half acres from Amanda T. Rider in 1871 for $500 (LW 13/73). The Deal Island Bank remained in operation until 1919, ^{and six years later} the property was included in a chancery case with the State of Maryland.
