Description

The Hess House, Keedysville's oldest dwelling was built in two parts. The oldest is a two story, four bay log structure with a central chimney. Added to the east end of this is a two story, three bay stone addition dating from 1810-20. The house which faces south is not oriented to Main Street, but rather to the old 18th century road, and to the mill site. The house has been modified, but its small windows and Germanic central chimney represent its 18th century origins. The current finish on the log section is German siding, probably the second generation of siding. Windows have wide, massive frames typical of the 18th century, but the sash were replaced with two over two pane windows. The main entrance to the log section is located in the second bay from the west end of the building. A door into the stone addition is in its west end bay near where it is attached to the log part. It has a transom with fancy curved muntons. The central chimney is a small brick structure and the stone portion has a large inside end stone chimney with a corbel at its top. The roof is of sheet metal. A one story shed roofed porch supported by turned posts extends across the entire front. A one story stone addition extends to the rear.

Other features of the property include a stone out-kitchen, west of the house, and remnants of the mill's head race.

This house was built by Jacob Hess after he acquired this property for his mill in 1768. Jacob Hess was born in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, but his father Hans had emigrated from Switzerland. The 1783 tax assessment for the Hess property listed a mill, a swisser barn and several log houses. The log portion of this house is all that remains of this collection. Jacob Hess died in 1815, but his heirs continued to own the property until they sold it to John J. Keedy in 1833.

German Reformed Brethren church services were held in the log house during Hess ownership and it is believed that General McClellan dined there prior to the Battle of Antietam.
