Description

This frame three bay, two story house was once part of the property adjoining to the south. According to local historians it was initially built as a chicken house, converted to a store and finally to a dwelling. It has two over two pane windows with flat top molded architraves. There is a central entrance. The house is sided with narrow vertical boards.

Arita Van Rensselaer's history relates that this was a meat house conducted by George Snively. "At this spot," according to her manuscript, "during the Civil War, General Wright was wounded as two opposing companies accidentally met here and shot at each other."
