GRAY HOUSE
Port Republic
Private

early 20th century

Built by John A. Gray and his son Thomas at the turn of the 20th century, this dwelling is one of the largest houses owned and built by a black family in Southern Maryland. A two-story frame house with a central gable pediment, it was constructed from local materials with assistance from the local community. Like many farmhouses built by blacks in the region, its gable ends are oriented on a north-south axis and do not have windows. The floor plan consists of a central stair hall flanked both downstairs and upstairs by two rooms, plus an "L" extension from the northern end.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Though decrepit, uncared for, and inhabited by impoverished tenants, this large two story frame house was once the center of a well-tended farmstead. The former owner, Thomas Gray, lives in the vicinity and is now 83 years old. He said that he had helped his father, John Alexander Gray, to build the house when he was about fifteen, which would date the house to c. 1908. In those years, the front grounds of the house (east) were carefully maintained. To the east of the front drive were stables for animals. Close by the house to the south was the well and further from it was planted a large peach orchard, the produce of which was sold at the nearby wharves on the Patuxent River for shipment to Baltimore. In addition to providing the preceding information, Gray said that behind the house stood a complex of outbuildings, which included a meat house, a "corn house," a large vegetable garden, and at further distance hog pens and two tobacco barns. Except for the well, none of these remain.

The farm house is built in an L design. The principal block is 1 bay deep and has a symmetrical facade of three bays sheltered by a shed porch. The two story extension is 1 bay in length and 1 bay in width. The roof is crossed by a central gable pediment into which is let a 2 x 2 double hung sash window. The other windows in the facade are 3 x 3 and ^{have} ~~are~~ double hung sashes. These large windows provided much more sunlight than was available in the smaller farm houses of blacks surveyed elsewhere in southern Maryland. There were no windows on the gable ends.

In plan the interior consisted of two rooms downstairs flanking a central passage through which ascended a one flight of stairs to the two rooms upstairs. Brick stove flues ascended the interior of each gable end. The extension consisted of one room, the kitchen, and two rooms upstairs, which were used as bedrooms.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Will V.C.C. 1/146 (.887) and its codicil V.C.C. 1/149 (1888) show that Jennie Allsup and her future husband John A. Gray were given the two sections of land, which together comprised the 69 acre farm, by a Thomas Gray, whose relationship to them was not stated in the documents. According their son, Thomas Gray, his parents lived at first in a small, four room, one story house on this land. When his parents were able to save enough money, they decided to build this more spacious and impressive house. Rather ^{than} ~~of~~ hiring carpenters, the Grays built the house themselves with the occasional help of neighbors. Instead of buying materials for a balloon frame house, they hewed logs cut on their property for a heavy post and beam frame. Other pieces of timber they hauled to the mill to be sawn into boards and lathes. They result was one of the larger farm houses built and occupied by blacks at that ^{time} in southern Maryland and reveals the opportunity that land ownership offered when combined with other talents.
