TOBACCO BARN
Port Republic
Private

late 19th century

This tobacco barn is small in size and follows an uncommon longitudinal plan. It is thought to have contained an apparatus for heat-curing tobacco, unlike most barns in this region which depend on material-air curing.

Barn:

Except for those tobacco barns which are intended to be used in heat-curring, most tobacco barns are designed to let in a maximum of air while still protecting the crop from precipitation and damaging winds. The design of this barn makes few attempts at natural air curring and may have utilized a curring apparatus. Mr. Ollie Bowen, aged eighty-nine years, remembers that it did.

The unusualness of this barn includes its size. It is a small barn containing only five rooms which divide the building longitudinally rather than the normal lateral arrangement of evenly numbered rooms (8, 10, or 12). The building is a single bay c. 20' square with a 12' x 20' saltbox on its south end. This shed appears to be original to the plan.

The frame contains hewn sills, angle braces, uprights, and tie-beams, but the plates are circular sawn. The horizontal weatherboards are also circular sawn and attached with wire nails.

The plan provides for three rather small doors (46" x 6'6") to vent the northeast and west sides of the main block and a pair of double doors (9'6" wide, 6'6" high) vent the south wall of the shed. The main block has 12' inbetween the plates and sills and the shed 9' on the south wall.
