DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Riverslie is the last house on Miles River Neck Road. It is situated on Hunting Creek with a view toward Miles River.

The house was constructed in the third quarter of the 19th century upon a granite foundation. Its frame walls are covered with aluminum siding. The windows have 6/6 sash and louvered shutters and the main roof is hipped. It is composed of a rectangular box and subsequently had a tower-like addition built onto the facade of one of its three bays. (Similar to Sherwood Forest) A fire destroyed the kitchen wing in 1974 and the present structure dates from that period.

The entrance facade of the building has the original two windows exposed on the second story with a leanto porch below. Part of the porch is enclosed for a bath and the other part is screened and serves as an outside vestibule to the main door. On the remaining one bay is the two story tower-like addition with low pitch pediment. Two brick chimneys pierce the roof near its center.

On the river side (S.W.) are only two bays per story. Across the first story is a screened porch which, if not original is a replacement of an original porch. The two windows of the first story have gyb doors providing access between the porch and inside.

Its floor plan consists of the same plan, on a smaller scale, as Pleasant Valley, a house built about 90 years before. To this four room plan were added a tower room in front of the stair and a bath in front of the smaller room opposite the stair.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Riverslie is a significant dwelling, architecturally, as a good quality structure built in the third quarter of the 19th century. It is said the building was a forrunner of the pre-fabricated building of today. That is, the pieces were cut and shipped to the site where it was erected. Still Waters, farther up Hunting Creek is another house of the same sort except its facade is more like a late Federal structure, whereas Riverslie, originally very plain, is almost Georgian in appearance.
