Raley Outbuilding
Mechanicsville
Private

2nd Quarter of 19th C.

This small, one story frame building was probably built to serve as the kitchen for the antebellum main house that once stood nearby. It consisted of one room downstairs, and another upstairs, to which a ladder ascended on the outside gable end, there being no stairs inside.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This small frame building stands east of the present farm house with its facade oriented toward the south, in the direction of old Rt. 5. The facade is one bay in length, and the building is one bay in width. It is unpainted, with weatherboards overlapping the frame. A brick chimney, in derelict condition, ascends the west gable end. The rear length has no opening.

The interior has one room warmed by a large firebox. There are no steps that lead to the loft above. Entrance to that area is obtained through an opening in the upper eastern end gable on the outside. Presumably a ladder was used. The interior was devoid of any decorative motifs, and was strictly utilitarian.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

According to local oral informants, this building was known as a "slave cabin" in the community. However, it was more probably built as a kitchen to serve the original main house (that has since burned). The upstairs may have served as a sleeping chamber for cook and family, though it is more likely that the steps would have been incorporated inside the structure had it been their principal residence. It is more likely that the upper chamber was used as a storage room.

The framing members are fastened by machine cut nails of the post-1820's variety, daing the building to no earlier than the 2nd quarter of the 19th century.
