c. 1880, c. 1925

Stradling the Nanticoke Road west of Cox's Corner is Turnstile farm, which is defined by a complex of late nineteenth and early twentieth structures. Accented by a picket fence, the two-story tee-shaped farmhouse dates around 1880 with a substantial tee addition built around 1925. A pair of domestic outbuildings--a gable-front wash house and a gable-front smoke house--survive behind the house. One of the most interesting farm buildings is a large three-level sweet potato house that stands on the south side of the road. Dating around 1910, the weatherboard frame potato house is distinguished by its large size and steeply pitched gable roof. Small openings in each side are covered with board shutters.

Turnstile farm, named for the seventeenth century patent "Turnstile," was improved by its current buildings between c. 1880 and 1920. When Isaac C. Jones and his new wife, Martha Ella Jones, moved here after their marriage in 1894, the two-and-a-half story farmhouse was relatively new. Construction of several domestic outbuildings and farm structures took place over the following few decades along with the enlargement of the house around 1925.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

Turnstile farm is located on the north side of Nanticoke Road (MD 349) a quarter mile west of Cox's Corner, Wicomico County, Maryland. The two-story, tee-shaped frame house faces southwest with the principal gable roof oriented on a northwest/southeast axis.

Dating from the late nineteenth century (c. 1880) and the early twentieth century (c. 1925), the main house was built in two distinct stages, beginning with a two-story, three-bay, center hall, single-pile farmhouse. Around 1925, the house was enlarged with a two-story addition that extended forward from the front of the late nineteenth century structure, yielding a tee-shape to the main block. The entire house is sheathed with a combination of aluminum and plain weatherboard siding. The medium pitched gable roof is covered with asphalt shingles. Joining the house on the lot is a gable roofed wash house and a gable roofed smokehouse, which stand in the back yard. Across the road is a large two-story gable roofed potato house erected around 1910.

The tee-shaped farmhouse has its principal entrance in the northwest side, which is sheltered on the first floor by a tapered post porch. The sidelighted front entrance is flanked by six-over-six sash windows retaining louvered shutters. The gable end of the early twentieth century addition is marked by a paired six-over-six sash windows, and the eave is extended with the soffit enclosed. Cornice returns finish the base of the roof. Rising through the center of the addition is an interior brick chimney stack.

The northwest gable end of the late nineteenth century house features a rebuilt exterior brick chimney stack flanked by six-over-six sash windows on each floor. Small two-over-two sash windows light the attic. Attached to the back of the main house is a two-story, two-bay kitchen wing.

The interior woodwork reflects the two distinct periods of construction. The front addition is divided into a entrance hall and parlor, whereas the late nineteenth century house follows a traditional center hall plan. The stair rises in the center hall, and a single room is located to each side. When the early twentieth century addition was built, the old front door was removed and a wide, square columned opening was installed. The original turned baluster stair survives intact with a boldly turned newel post and a molded handrail. The stringer is embellished with a scrolled decoration. The living room retains a late nineteenth century machine-made mantel with factory turned decorative moldings. The window and door openings are framed by plain surrounds. The second floor was not seen.

Standing in the backyard are two outbuildings, a single-story, gable-front frame wash house and a single-story, gable-front smokehouse. Both buildings rest on brick pier foundations and are sheathed with vinyl siding. The steeply pitched roofs are covered with asphalt shingles. The wash house has an off-center board door on the front wall, and six-over-six sash windows on each side. Rising on the rear wall is an exterior brick chimney stack with a corbeled base. The gable-front smoke house has a six-over-six sash window that pierces the southeast side and a board door that marks the gable front wall. The eaves are extended and the soffits are open.

Standing on the south side of Nanticoke Road is a two-story frame sweet potato house that rests on a brick and concrete foundation, and the building is sheathed with plain weatherboard siding over horizontal planking. The steeply pitched roof is covered with wood shingles. The northeast side that faces the road is three bays across with small window openings defining the first and second floors. Board shutters cover the window openings. The northwest gable end is marked by a pair of window openings on the second floor, and a single louvered opening that pierces the upper gable. The eaves of the building are extended with the soffits open. The southeast gable end is treated in a similar fashion with the additional feature of an interior end brick chimney. The southwest side is defined by a mixture of shuttered window and door openings that pierce the first and second floors.
