First National Bank

Private

1887

The organization of the First National Bank of Snow Hill dates to 1887 when Colonel John Walter Smith, Clayton J. Purnell, William S. Wilson, Zadock P. Wharton, E. W. McMaster and several others opened the doors to a new bank on September 12th of that year with $50,000 in capital assets. Six years later much of the business district was destroyed in the August 1893 fire. Although the bank building suffered severe damage, it was repaired within the following six months. Immediately after the fire, the Democratic Messenger stated that business would be temporarily transacted in the law office of one of the bank's founders, Clayton J. Purnell, located on the courthouse square. It had miraculously survived the blaze.

On January 6, 1894, an entry was written announcing that,

The First National Bank building, which was badly damaged during the fire of August 7th last, has been repaired and is now as good as ever. It will be occupied at once. Cashier Matthews is pleased at the idea of again being in his handsome and more business like quarters and we don't blame him.

The single-story Victorian brick bank was designed with a round, corner entrance tower topped by a conical slate roof. Large, arched window openings accented with red sandstone lintels and sills distinguish the prominent street elevations. When the building was enlarged recently to include a drive-in window and more office space, care was taken to follow the original scale and design motifs that characterized the 1880s bank.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The First National Bank stands on the northwest corner of the intersection of West Market Street and Bank Street in the center of Snow Hill, Worcester County, Maryland. The single-story brick building was erected with a corner entrance that faces in a southeasterly direction.

Erected in 1887, the single-story, rectangular brick bank is laid in five-course common bond with an entrance tower dominating the southeast corner. The main building is covered by a slate hip roof, while the modern additions to the rear are covered with flat roofs. Piercing the round tower is a modern double glass door that is topped by a rusticated red sandstone lintel. To each side the walls are marked by three large arched sixteen-over-one sash windows covered with iron grills. Surmounting each window opening is a three rollock course arch that is filled with a window, and the openings are fitted with rusticated red sandstone lintels and sills as well. In contrast to the smooth red brick walls below the window header height is a raised checkerboard pattern above the windows on each side. Finishing the top of the wall is a molded brick cornice. A brick chimney rises through the southwest side of the old section between the more modern drive-through additions.

The balance of the building is covered with later additions, and the interior has been reworked with most of the original features covered over or removed.

The windows and doors have red sandstone sills and lintels. Above the lintels of the windows are semicircular arched transoms. The brick work above the height of the lintels is laid in Flemish bond with the headers set back from the surface about one-half inch creating a basket-weave pattern to the pedestrian. Above this is a molded brick cornice. The roof is essentially a hipped roof with some superimposed hips where the wall 'breaks out' on each side. The tower has a conical roof with copper ball finial.
