Esau Boston Farm
Pocomoke City vicinity
Private

c. 1815, c. 1840, c. 1900

The Esau Boston or Tull farmhouse is one of the oldest surviving frame dwellings to remain standing southwest of Pocomoke City. Estimated to date to the early nineteenth century, c. 1815, the single-story two-room plan dwelling was enlarged around 1840 by a taller two-story, two-bay addition that gave the house a stepped appearance. Extending northward from the house is a single-story hyphen that joins a turn of the twentieth century kitchen. Although the additions are not built on the same axis, the Esau Boston house follows the regionally distinctive stepped or telescope building history common to vernacular traditions. The interiors have survived with representative examples of early to mid nineteenth century woodwork. Joining the house on this farm are two significant outbuildings, a single-story brick dairy dating to around 1840 and a rectangular frame slave house thought to date to 1850.

On December 3, 1798, Esau Boston, Sr. was issued a resurvey of his land, comprising several tracts which he consolidated under one name, "Lock." Included in the 189 acres were parts of "Boston's Hardship," "Keel," "Rudder," and part of "Long Trusted." Esau Boston, Sr. evidently financed the construction of the oldest part of this house during the first quarter of the nineteenth century. In 1835 Esau Boston, Sr. transferred ownership of his resurveyed lands to his son Esau Boston, Jr. (1784-1869) Esau, Jr. is recorded in 1837 as one of four commissioners appointed by the General Assembly to condemn and lay off a lot of ground for a public wharf at Cedar Hall landing. Esau, Jr. married three times, Jane Beauchamp in May 1807; Mary Broughton in March 1833; and finally

Mariah Melvin in February 1847. In 1860, Esau Boston is listed in the U. S. Census as a relatively wealthy farmer with assets around $20,000. He died in 1869 and left his, "Farm whereon I now dwell called by the name 'Lock' containing one hundred and eighty acres," to his son James Henry Boston. He also bequeathed to his son James his best Bible and four shares of captial stock in the "Pocomoke Bridge Company." (TT 8/519) Boston family ownership of the farm was maintained until 1910 when the farm was sold to James S. Clogg.(ODC 6/120) The current owner purchased the farm in 1929.(BB 10/239)

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Esau Boston farm, more commonly known as the Reuben Tull farm, is located on the south side of Cedar Hall Road three miles southwest of Pocomoke City, Worcester County, Maryland. The two-story main house faces south with the gable roof oriented on an east/west axis.

Built in at least three distinct stages the oldest part of this stepped or telescope frame house involves the eastern single-story, three-bay frame house that was enlarged around 1840 with the two-story, two-bay frame addition that extends from the west gable end of the original dwelling. Attached to the back of the house is a single-story hyphen that joins a two-story turn of the twentieth century one-bay by one-room kitchen. Supported by a concrete block and brick foundation, the house is uniformly sheathed with a layer of asbestos shingles, and the various pitched roofs are covered by a layer of asphalt shingles. The farmhouse is joined on the property by a common bond brick dairy, a former slave house that has been extensively rebuilt, and a row of mid to late nineteenth century outbuildings including a granary, two corn cribs, and a smokehouse.

The south (main) elevation of the original single-story two-room plan frame house is marked by a side entrance and flanking single-pane sash windows. The cornice is boxed. The east gable end of the original house is defined by an exposed and stuccoed brick firewall, a side six-panel door entrance and a single-pane sash window. The upper gable is marked by a pair of six-over-six sash windows to either side of an interior end brick stack topped by a corbelled brick cap. The flush gable end is trimmed by a bargeboard.

Fully covering the west gable end is the 1840s two-story, two-bay addition that contains a front side entrance as well. Single-pane sash fill the window openings, and a boxed cornice trims the base of the roof. Four-over-two sash windows pierce the east end above the original house to light the attic. The west end of the addition is dominated by an exterior common bond brick stack with a corbelled base and corbelled shoulders. Bargeboards finish the gable ends.

Extending to the rear is a short single-story hyphen that joins the kitchen service to the house. The kitchen wing is a two-story, one-room plan frame structure lighted by two-over-two sash windows on each floor. An interior end brick chimney protrudes through the north gable end. The eaves are extended slightly beyond the wall surface.

The interior of the original house is divided on the first floor into two room fitted with early nineteenth century woodwork dating to around 1815. The woodwork, including period doors and mantels, remain in place. The second floor was not seen.

Standing next to the house on the west side is a single-story, four-course common bond brick dairy. The gable front structure has an east end entrance and boarded over six-over-six sash window openings in each side. The floor level of the interior is well below grade, and riven lath and plaster finish the walls. Some of the shelving remains in place as well.

North of the house is a single-story gable roof frame outbuilding referred to by Mrs. Tull as the old slave house. Estimated to date to the second quarter of the nineteenth century, the rectangular weatherboard frame structure has been extensively rebuilt with later replacement studs and framing members. Little of the original mortise-and-tenon joinery remains intact. Several strap hinges are found on interior doors. A shed addition extends the building to the rear.

Other outbuildings include a mortise-and-tenon frame granary with later sheds to each side, and two rectangular frame corn cribs.
