

CARR-1590

1330 N. Main St., Hampstead

Summary:

John W. Murray was a farmer on the east side of Hampstead. In 1879, he sold a group of lots on the west side of Main Street. That at 1330 Main Street was sold to J. Oliver Murray, who was presumably the son of John W. At the time J. Oliver had stock-in-trade of $150, and his trade was marketing. He was assessed in 1880 for improvements worth $375 and for the lot at $75. The actual sale price of the lot was $100, so the value of the improvements, presumably the existing house, was also probably greater. Murray's house is a five-bay structure that appears to have a full center passage, with a single room to each side and a kitchen ell in the rear. It is a traditional structure with a few introduced features that became quite popular in the region in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. These features include the Italianate bracketed cornice and the central gabled wall dormer. Many dormers have lancet sash, but this example is semicircular, which is more in keeping, stylistically, with the Italianate cornice. The front porch is probably an early twentieth century replacement.

Description

The J. Oliver Murray House is located at 1330 Main Street at the northwest corner of the intersection of Main Street and Rinaman Alley in Hampstead in northeastern Carroll County, Maryland. It is 2 ½ story five bay by two bay wood structure with a two bay 2 story ell on the west. It has a rubble-stone foundation; asphalt shingles and a gable roof on the main block with standing seam metal and a north/south ridge. The ell has a gable roof of standing seam metal with an east/west ridge. There are interior brick chimneys on the north, south and west gable ends.

The first story of the east elevation has a center entrance with a four panel door; side lights with two lights over one panel and a 3-light transom. There are two 2/2 double-hung sash on either side of the doorway. There is a 1 story three bay porch centered on the east elevation. It has a shed roof of standing seam metal supported by four battered wood posts set on brick piers. There are square vertical balusters between the piers. The second story has no opening in the center. There are two 2/2 sash to either side of the center bay. There is a bracketed cornice and a central gabled wall dormer with a segmentally arched 2/2 sash.

On the north elevation, the ell is in the same plane as the main block. The first story has two 2/2 sash in the main block; a door with a hood on plain wood brackets in the east bay of the ell and a 2/2 sash in the west bay of the ell. The second story has four 2/2 sash. The gable end of the main block has two 4-light sash. The ell has a plain wood box cornice. The south elevation of the main block has two 2/2 sash on both the first and second stories and two 4-light sash in the gable end.

The south elevation of the ell is recessed. On the first story, there is a four panel door in the west bay and a 2/2 sash in the east bay. The second story has two 2/2 sash. There is an ell shaped 1 story porch on the first story that runs along the south side of the ell and the east side of the summer kitchen. It has a standing seam metal roof. The west elevation of the ell has a 2/2 sash set to the south on the first and second stories and two 4-light sash in the gable end.

There is a summer kitchen located at the southwest corner of the ell. It is a 1 ½ story two bay by two bay structure with the same siding as the house and a gable roof of corrugated metal with an east/west ridge. As noted before, the ell porch connects to the east end of this summer kitchen. The east elevation has a 6/6 sash in the south bay and a four panel door in the north bay. The south elevation has two 6/6 sash and the west elevation has a vertical board door in the north bay with no opening in the south bay. There is a 4-light sash in the gable end.

Description

About six feet west of the ell is a smokehouse. It is a 1 story one bay square structure with German siding and a gable roof of standing seam metal with a north/south ridge. There is a vertical board door on the south elevation. At the west end of the lot is a carriage house. This is a 2 story four bay by one bay structure with asphalt shingle siding in a tan brick pattern that is laid over top of vertical boards. It has a gable roof of corrugated metal with a north/south ridge. On the east elevation, the lower story has beaded-edge-in-center vertical board double wagon doors hung on rollers in the two south bays. The two north bays are recessed and have board and batten siding. The north center bay has no opening. There is a stairway here that goes up to the south to the second story. The north bay has a vertical board Dutch door. The north end of the recess is sided and has the remains of a four door cupboard. One door survives and has a single fielded panel. The upper story has four wood louvered vents all in the same plane as there is no recess on the north bays here. The north end of the building is cantilevered on the east but there is a post in the northeast corner. The south elevation has no openings. On the west elevation, the first story has no openings. The second story has a door in the north bay that has been closed over. The north elevation also has no openings. On the south side of the recess, there is a vertical board door. John W. Murray was a farmer on the east side of Hampstead. In 1879, he sold a group of lots on the west side of Main Street. That at 1330 Main Street was sold to J. Oliver Murray, who was presumably the son of John W. At the time J. Oliver had stock-in-trade of $150, and his trade was marketing. He was assessed in 1880 for improvements worth $375 and for the lot at $75. The actual sale price of the lot was $100, so the value of the improvements, presumably the existing house, was also probably greater. Murray's house is a five-bay structure that appears to have a full center passage, with a single room to each side and a kitchen ell in the rear. It is a traditional structure with a few introduced features that became quite popular in the region in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. These features include the Italianate bracketed cornice and the central gabled wall dormer. Many dormers have lancet sash, but this example is semicircular, which is more in keeping, stylistically, with the Italianate cornice. The front porch is probably an early twentieth century replacement.

Other features of note on the property include the summer kitchen attached to the side porch, a trait seen in numerous Hampstead houses of the period. The small ground barn that incorporates a cantilevered forebay over the half of the building that stabled livestock seems to be a form typical of small parcels where farming was not the primary occupation. Little work has been done on these structures, unfortunately, but Hampstead has several; one was recently demolished on the Ebaugh-Shaffer property at 1347 Main Street (CARR-1577). The creation of these lots, and the following construction, are likely an outgrowth of the arrival of the railroad in Hampstead in 1877.

In 1896, J. Oliver Murray was assessed for a Huckster Wagon and accoutrements, and it would appear that this was his business for the previous twenty years. While the term huckster tends to have a negative connotations today, the size and quality of the house Murray built demonstrates that it was a lucrative occupation, and an important one for Carroll County farmers who had to get their perishable products to market. It is interesting that Murray was able to stay in business despite the obvious competition of the railroad. The 1911 Sanborn Map suggests that the front porch may have been larger than it is today, but otherwise the property does not seem to have changed. The Matthews family acquired it in 1936 and has retained it to the present.
