The People Versus the Public Service

By Justice William J. Gaynor.

HESE agitations for municipal ownership, and to some tent for municipal management, have, in my judgment, arisen not out of any hostility to capital or to the private management of public service corporations. The live coal now in the mind of this country was neither originated nor is it being fanned into flame by such hostility. On the contrary, it has come wholly from the mismanagement of these trary, it has come wholly from the mismanagement of these trary is the come wholly from the mismanagement of these trary. enterprises, in overcapitalization, in watering stock again and again. The community cannot look without feeling, without regret, without deep resentment and, finally, without action to the doubling up of capital, the trebling of capital put into these public franchises, representing nothing but a

We see these great companies in New York now united and leasing themselves for 999 years. Dear me, think of our standing that thing for 999 years! Nine years is more likely than 999. Is the actual capital doubled? No, not the capital but these great gifts, these franchises that are nothing but licenses from the people, are made a drain on the community, by being bonded and the stock doubled up, year after year, until the sum has become colossal enough—I will be bold enough to say it even in this presence—dishonest enough to shock the moral sense of the people of this country. There is the seed of this hostility, this feeling toward these corporations. We have just had a great debate in Washington touching on the railways. The same thing is true of them. There is no resentment in Washingto capital but there is best fity to these public utilities being made a perpetual tan on the people as though the recipients had the eight to do as What are the railroads but our public highways
