The idea occurs to me that one of son, and present you with his picture the laws most urgently needed would make it impossible for a son to inherit even a cent from his parents. Of course the female progeny of a man would have to be excepted from such an arrangement. Such legislation would oblige the indulgent father to give his son a common sense education, cultivate in him a sense of healthy independence. Secondly, the young man who, under the present dispensation, has more money than sense or conception of his ethical obligations to society would find his der Dr. Boyd one of the greatest men mington district spent Sunday and path less slippery and would have the the race, and I was indeed proud to Monday in Port. The widow should be subject to the same conditions-remarriage should cause her Fifty years ago he made the dirt fly to forfeit all claims to her former husband's estate. In her case, however, the portion due should be subject to no other conditions. The last named arrangement would prevent a good many of the old man's darling marriages, and would cause a decided decrease in moral iniquity of a very obnoxious character.

This proposition naturally sounds radical enough to be called Spartan, yet such a law, while placing no curb on personal ambition, would rob thousands of misguided parents of the only pleasure they really have that of slaving for an ungrateful posterity.
