An Indiana Telephone girl has won husband because of her sweet Doubtless the husband is to congratulated, because, as high and law an excellent thing in Joman, and is, it may be added; essecially desirable in the case of the woman who presides over the domes tic hearth. With this example before them, and others of the kind now and then reported, it might be thought that the young women at the telephone exchanges would engage in systematic cultivation of sweet and musical intonation. There is, however, a much better opportunity before them for winning popularity than is to be gained by mere vocal sweetness, and that is promptness of speech and action. What does it matter to the average telephone patron whether the voice of the operator at the switch-board is melodious of not if it is slow in coming over the wire, or if it is heard, after long delay, only to drawl "number?" and again "number?" after more delay, and then connects with a number quite different from the one the patron calls. What does it profit the telephone girl, matrimonially of otherwise, if she calmly, through in dulcet voice, declares to the anxious caller that the line is "busy now," and continues so to assert, while the impatient man at the other end of the wire with good reason to know it is not busy listens in a frenizied state of mind to her idle chat with her chums? Ney, verily, it is not sweetness for which the telephone subscriber yearns, but for a swift answer to his calls and prompt and accurate connection with the other telephone. The voice may be shrill and sharp, or hoarse and raucous, or it may be impeded by a wad of gum, but it will win favor it it only responds quickly. If the telephone girl cannot be both mellifluous and prompt, let her be prompt, and she will be more likely to get a husband than through sweetness alone. Also she will do much to lessen the present sum total of unseemly wrath and profanity in the
