Rabbi Goldstein, 33, heads Baltimore Hebrew Congregation

"Regardless of whether a person is black or white, Christian or Jew, he should be as important to us as the welfare of our own family."

This philosophy, coupled with a strong u[illegible] to make this world a better place through "action", is the drivi[illegible] 33 year old Rabbi David S. Goldstein, new leader of the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation, and the more than 1,000 members of his Synagogue.

Rabbi Goldstein succeeds the Rabbi Morris Lieberman who died in September at the age of 61. Rabbi Goldstein served as an associate of Rabbi Lieberman who was a strong civil rights advocate.

Born in Princeton, N.J the new spiritual leader attended Miami University in Ohio and Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York.

Rabbi Goldstein and his wife, Shannie, make their home in northwest Baltimore. They have a son, Ari.

As head of Baltimore's largest Hebrew Congregation, Rabbi Goldstein says that he will continue his predecessor's "new thrust" into the community with increased programs of social welfare and action."

"We have a partnership in the future of the community and only through shared responsibilities and a feeling of brotherhood can black and white work hand in hand for their shared interests and concerns."

High ideals alone, however, do not make up the backbone of Rabbi Goldstein's rabbinate. "We must strive to make those ideals realities," he cautions.

Two ways in which Rabbi Goldstein and his congregation are moving toward making these ideals realities is through education and community involvement.

• • •

"The role of the Synagogue is to educate its membership and to create a climate that will stimulate them to work toward these aims: 1) to further the welfare of the community; and 2) to make the world a better place.

"We teach this because it is imperative for us. Each must be concerned about his brother."

Members of the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation have carried this philosophy with them as they venture out into the community, helping where they can.

• • •

Among the programs in which the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation is "deeply interested" is a Day Care Center, which they helped to plan and finance, located in a predominantly black East Baltimore neighborhood.

Another community project, Northwest Baltimore Corporation, whose main thrust is housing, zoning, welfare and social services, has several Congregation members on the Board of this integrated organization.

Besides a continuation of programs of social concern, Rabbi Goldstein sees the future course of action for his congregation as "to increase the involvement of youngsters in many of the concerns of the community.

"Many of them already work in hospitals and in the Day Care Center. We are faced with the challenge of stimulating the young people.

"Our job is to respond to that challenge."
