Howard County gets opportunity to take a giant step

By Pinale L. Rees

Howard County along with the rest of this country is in the midst of another beginning with this new decade, the 1980s, and new cycles always bring with them cause to reflect on both past and future.

Standing as an always proud and often progressive Maryland County, Howard is rich in both rural heritage and new urban lifestyles.

Effective July 1, 1980, the Maryland Legislature has a newly-created Howard County District Court Judgeship. In keeping with and to fully recognize our diversity, it is more than appropriate that Howard County step, not backward, not laterally, but forward in its selection for this judgeship — fill it with new blood, a fresh concept, a fram of reference unique to the bench, and an additional area of sensitivity all of which can never be in excess.

This county, as a whole, has an 18 percent black population. Within the "new city" area itself, blacks comprise 25 percent of the population.

Yet there are no black elected officials here; no blacks hold high appointed office; no blacks serve in positions of political power and few have socio-economic power wherein decisions are made that shape and determine our futures.

Georgia Goslee, a well-qualified black lawyer has applied. This female lawyer is a University of Maryland Law School graduate, a former assistant U.S. attorney and a long time resident of Howard County now engaged in full-time practice here.

She has evidenced her great love for the county through the ultimate tests: county residence, county practice and her family's education within the county's public school system.

The appointed authorities owe it to Howard County's constituency of all colors not to side-step this vital opportunity for moving forward into the new conciousness of this decade and a rich new concept for equity in judicial representation.
