Moral Majority opposes sex education bill

A bill which would permit school counselors and nurses to answer student questions on such topics as pregnancy prevention, venereal disease and drug and alcohol abuse programs is being fought by the Maryland chapter of the Moral Majority, the AFRO learned this week.

Members of the right-wing religious group have changed the name of the bill, introduced as the Health Information Bill, to the "Contraceptive Counseling Bill" in efforts to dissuade the General Assembly from taking positive action on its message.

In a letter to members of the House of Delegates, James Wright, the organizations executive director, said the "Contraceptive Counseling Bill" would give the very public employees hired with the parents tax dollars the right to contradict the values the parents may have labored hard to build into their childrens character."

The conservative lobbying organization was joined by the Catholic church in its efforts to defeat the bill introduced by Delegates Kay Bienen (D-PrinceGeorges) and Torrey Brown (D-Baltimore).

In a separate memo to House members, Francis McIntyre, legislativespokesman for the Maryland CVATHOLIC Conference, said he has misinterpreted the wishes of... the Catholic bishops of Maryland" by telling lawmakers two weeks ago that they could support an amended version of the Health Information Bill.

To eliminate the objections of the Catholics, the House Environmental Matters Committee adopted amendments that specifically would prohibit the school officials from responding to questions concerning abortion and sterilization.

It also changed a reference in the bill to "contraception" from "pregnancy prevention", fearing that some counselors might misinterpret the former word to include abortion.

But McIntyre said the Catholic bishops still opposed the bill because it would permit the counselors to discuss birth control pills and intrauterine devices.

He also said if the bill becomes law, the "absence of informed parental consent would be a precedent which will unleash a destructive surge toward the substitution of the state for the parent in the most delicate areas of parent-child relationships."
