TWILAH SAYS...
By Twilah Scarborough

To My AFRO Readers and Friends: For years, I have wanted to express this article and now I feel free to do so.

THERE ARE TWO kinds of selfishness, a positive and a negative kind. Positive selfishness sallies forth in a matter-of-fact way trying to take whatever it wants.

Negative selfishness, on the other hand, works in a subtle way and might be thought by a casual observer to be self-abnegation.

It does not openly try to take things from others by force but it keeps self ever in the foreground.

Negative selfishness is more harmful to the individual who indulges in it than it is to his associates.

We hear a good deal today about inferiority complexes. These seem closely related to some form of selfishness.

Persons with so-called inferiority complexes have centered their attention upon their own defects or their unfortunate circumstances to such a degree that they think these things are also the chief interest of everybody else.

They usually feel themselves to be at a disadvantage in the sights of others.

Often it happen that some children grow up fearing that the other members of the family are more favored in looks, intelligence, or abilities and, because of the remembrance of some slighting remark, they perhaps become timid and insensitive.

They look for slights, and their feelings are easily hurt. They imagine that they are not welcome in the company of others.

In nearly all such cases the feeling of unwelcomeness is imaginary.

Such persons need to assure themselves often that they are no better or worse than the average person and that others do not have time to think about them as often as they think about themselves.

We can reason ourselves out of the notions of self-importance that our human ego conjures up. Truth students should quietly throw off such fetters of the past.

It is helpful to realize that we are all God's children and that in spirit we are all one in Christ. If there has been some handicap in our past life it should be cast out of our mind and the freeing consciousness of Christ's love put in its place.

The realization of the impersonal love of Christ for all will help one to enter into the society of others naturally and easily.

"Christ in me" is the key to a natural, pleasing manner.

Held instead of thoughts of self-condemnation, such a thought will help one to do and say the right thing with poise and ease. It is not necessary to overdo in courtesy, dress, words, or action in order to please.

One who thinks more about wholesome ideals and daily work and about the comfort and feelings of others will soon become free from self-consciousness and from that peculiar awkward feeling that comes of thinking about what we lack.

All truth students who are self-conscious or ill at ease should at once take up the matter in Truth and forgive themselves for believing in separation from God's universal love.

By right thinking they can set themselves free from past mistaken notions and begin to look out upon life as a great fellowship in which they may take part not as one in the limelight but as one of a companionable group.

It is all right to affirm our own perfection, but we must remember that this perfection is in our spirit and not in our personality.

It is not good to compare one personality with that of others and to think of our faults and our virtues whenever the faults of others are mentioned.

When the shortcomings of others are brought up we should deny that they have any reality in Truth. By so doing we shall not pin them on ourselves.

If you are conscious that you have a fault, forgive yourself and free yourself from it.

If we can disabuse our mind of the tormenting thought that there are high and low places we shall not be ill at ease any more.

It is said that "B natural" is the keynote of good manners. Courtesy, politeness, and friendliness all spring up from a desire to make others happy.

Forgetting self long enough to enter into the joy of serving others is a pleasant pastime. We do have to think of self at times, to feed the body and make it appear attractive and give mind and body exercise and training; but when the thought of self grows to such colossal proportions that it comes between us and all activities like a cloud, it is time to deflate it.

Jesus said, "Not my will, but thine, be done." When the will of Christ is being done in us we do not need to worry about our personal shortcomings.

If one of us is still holding onto some outmoded old childish notion that came from past misunderstood experiences, we should cast it away.

We may cast it upon the Lord, and whoever does this becomes a new creature in Christ consciousness.

Freedom will come to us as we breathe the fresh air of loving brotherhood with all people.

And, Faith Without Love is Unacceptable!
